Total of 621 nonfatal accidents, according to Nevada Industrial Commission.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, competent evidence of the violation by the Six Companies (Inc.), of the Nevada mine safety laws and Federal decision No. 19 issued by the Mine Safety Board of the United States Bureau of Mines is contained in a telegram from A. J. Stinson, inspector of mines for Nevada, addressed to me under date of January 10, 1933, which I quote as follows:

In driving tunnels Six Companies did use internal combustion engines and as many as 12 large-horsepower gasoline trucks and 2 gasoline-driven tractors operating at one point at one time in the tunnel. On November 7, 1931, the following recommendation was served on the Six Companies (Inc.), Boulder City, Nev. Notice is hereby given that after careful examination of the premises known as Hoover Dam and operated by said corporation, particularly large tunnel No. 2, in the course of construction on Nevada side, Colorado River, in connection with the construction of Hoover Dam, Boulder Canyon, Clark County, Nev., I make the following recommendations: That gasoline be not used in any manner inside large tunnels or underground workings; that if trucks or other vehicles propelled by gasoline or by use of gasoline in any manner whatsoever are being used in the construction of said tunnels, then and in that event the use of all such trucks and vehicles so propelled be discontinued at once for the reason that the use of such trucks or vehicles inside said tunnels or underground workings is in clear violation of the laws of the State of Nevada, particularly section 4229, Compiled Laws, Nevada, 1929 and 1931 Statutes, Nevada, chapter 167, pages 274–275. Without delay cause these recommendations to be carried out in order to make said premises safe for employees. Six Companies (Inc.) did and are now violating the above section of the State law, which means a detriment to the lives and limbs of the men employed therein. The following telegram was received from the Bureau of Mines engineers: "Oppose the use of fuel-burning engines or locomotives in mines and tunnels, signed O. P. Hood, Acting Director." The affidavit of Fred Lowell, mining engineer and inspector California Industrial Accident Commission, and that filed by Philip Samuel Williams, state that at a point 500 feet from the portal of lower No. 2 tunnel the air contained 0.3 per cent carbon monoxide. The affidavit of Duschak states that 0.2 per cent carbon monoxide was recorded at the top of the muck pile two and one-half hours after round of holes had been blasted. If the air containing 0.2 per cent carbon monoxide were breathed continuously for a period of 30 minutes, the result would probably be fatal. John Dougherty v. Six Companies (Inc.) complained that for many weeks prior to and on the night of March 31 the defendant negligently caused many large gasoline trucks to be run in and out of said tunnel No. 2, discharging large quantities of carbon monoxide through the motor exhausts in quantities sufficient to and did actually endanger the health of the plaintiff by being overcome with carbon monoxide gas, etc.

With reference to the claim of the Secretary of the Interior that conformance with the Nevada mine safety statutes would increase the cost of the dam to the Government in accordance with a letter previously quoted, I submit for the RECORD a telegram of January 12, 1933, from A. J. Stinson, inspector of mines for Nevada, setting forth the facts, as follows:

Replying to your wire of to-day, the claim of the Secretary of the Interior that economy to the National Government was effected by preventing the application of State mine safety laws as to gasoline-propelled trucks in tunnels in the so-called Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation is absolutely ridiculous, because contract between the Six Companies and the Federal Government specifying definitely the entire contract price for construction of the entire project, including tunnels, was signed long before the controversy arose, and the price therein specified was not subject to increase, and because haulage in and from the tunnels was largely done by rented trucks and under yardage contract price made after the Six Companies knew the use of gasoline under ground in tunnels was prohibited by State law, and because the Six Companies could have purchased and rented electrically propelled haulage equipment instead of gasoline-propelled trucks and operated the same as economically as it operated gasoline-propelled trucks. Unquestionably the National Government could not have been injured and the cost of construction would not have been increased by the enforcement of State laws. If the Six Companies had rented or purchased electrical haulage equipment instead of gasoline-propelled equipment in the beginning, there would have been no additional cost even to it and certainly none to the National Government.

As evidence that the Secretary of the Interior had obtained the cooperation of the Department of Justice in behalf of the Six Companies (Inc.), a private corporation, I submit a letter addressed to me by the Attorney General, January 26, 1933, from which I quote the following:

In reply to that letter and on November 27, I advised the Secretary of the Interior that the United States attorney would be directed to render all possible assistance to the contractors in this case.

The entire letter is as follows:

JANUARY 26, 1933.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your secretary has inquired concerning the circumstances with respect to the attitude of the United States in connection with the action now pending in Nevada brought by the Six Companies for the purpose of restraining the officials of Nevada from various acts.

This matter was referred to me by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter under date of November 23, 1931, and in that letter the Secretary of the Interior requested that the United States attorney for Nevada be directed to appear as amicus curiæ, or to take such other measures as may be advisable for the protection of the interests of the United States. In reply to that letter and on November 27, I advised the Secretary of the Interior that the United States attorney would be directed to render all possible assistance to the contractors in this case. Thereafter, and on December 2, the United States attorney was instructed to keep in touch with such litigation, but not in any official capacity. He was instructed to make no official appearance in the litigation. Thereafter, and on December 28, 1931, he was advised that there was no objection to the filing of an amicus curiæ brief by the United States attorney.

The position of the United States, therefore, in this litigation is as above indicated, and it is not a party to the litigation itself. I have no recent information as to the status of this matter. I trust this will give you the information you desire.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM D. MITCHELL,
Attorney General.

It will be noted in the foregoing letter from the Attorney General that the Secretary of the Interior finally obtained the consent of the Attorney General to the filing of an amicus curiæ brief in the case of the Six Companies (Inc.), the private contractor, against A. J. Stinson, Nevada State mine inspector. In this way the Secretary of the Interior provided Federal counsel to assist in defending the Six Companies (Inc.) without any cost to the company, or, to put it another way, at the expense of the American taxpayer. Since the Bureau of Reclamation is in the Department of the Interior it was a simple matter for the Secretary of the Interior to order the counsel of the Reclamation Service to file an amicus curiæ brief in this case and further aid the Six Companies (Inc.), the private contractor, by supplying Government legal assistance at no cost to the company, the bill being paid by the American taxpayer.

Furthermore, the Secretary of the Interior, in attempting without adequate legal authority to create the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, and the court, in issuing the injunction which prevented the enforcement of the mine safety laws of the State of Nevada within the reservation and in violating decision No. 19 of the Federal Mine Safety Board, are jointly responsible with officials of the Six Companies (Inc.) for the heavy loss of life and impairment through accident or health which the men employed in the construction of Hoover Dam have suffered because of a failure to comply with the provisions of the mine safety laws of the State of Nevada and decision No. 19 of the Mine Safety Board of the United States Bureau of Mines. Attention has already been called to the fact that 22 deaths have occurred since the injunction went into effect, and in addition 756 men have sustained nonfatal accidents and injuries and are now receiving compensation from the Nevada Industrial Commission.

In not having been compelled to comply with the provisions of the mine safety laws of the State of Nevada which call for frequent inspections of the work and careful supervision of the methods employed, it is obvious that the Six Companies (Inc.) has utterly disregarded safeguarding the lives and health of the men employed by them in the construction work. It is, therefore, very important that this question be investigated immediately and the Six Companies (Inc.) be compelled to comply with the mine safety laws of the State of Nevada. Unless this is done promptly thousands of lives will be unnecessarily subjected to extreme risks and hazards, and it can be safely assumed that unless this is done promptly further lives will be unnecessarily lost; that many more accidents will occur; and that the health conditions will become still more serious, as a large part of this gigantic enterprise has not yet started. In allowing these conditions to prevail the contractor, the Six Companies (Inc.), will be permitted through cheaper and far more dangerous methods of construction to continue to create huge excess profits wholly at the expense of the life, health, and welfare of the labor it employs.

It is time that Congress should take up this important matter without delay and prevent the Federal Government from further participating in conditions which constitute a serious blot on the Government's record and which the American people will not tolerate and at which they will rebel when the facts are brought to their attention.

II. FAILURE OF SIX COMPANIES (INC.) TO PAY TAXES

The second serious condition which has arisen in connection with the construction of Hoover Dam is the failure of the Six Companies (Inc.) to pay its just taxes to Clark County and the State of Nevada.

The contract to do certain construction work at Hoover Dam was let by the Secretary of the Interior representing the Federal Government to the Six Companies (Inc.), the lowest bidder, on March 11, 1931. The specifications, advertisement for bids, and the contract contain no provision that the contractor would not be called upon to pay the necessary and just taxes to Clark County and the State of Nevada, and it therefore becomes apparent that the contractor included such taxes in the bid submitted to and accepted by the Secretary of the Interior.

Reference in the specifications is made to a payment by the contractor to the Federal Government of $5,000 a month for the rental of ground, the installation of the water supply, and the contractor's share in the cost of administering the town of Boulder City. This can not be construed as a payment by the contractor in lieu of county and State taxes, as the payment is confined to municipal affairs and is largely for ground rental and reimbursement to the Government for the installation of the water supply.

Not until May 19 did the Secretary of the Interior, without any adequate statutory authority, attempt to take advantage of a Nevada law passed in 1921, before the Boulder Canyon project act was considered by Congress, to create a reservation of exclusive Federal jurisdiction. It would seem from these facts that the question of attempting to relieve the Six Companies (Inc.) of the payment of taxes was an afterthought, and it is obvious that the Six Companies (Inc.) and not the Government would benefit by the excess profit created through relief from tax payments to Clark County and the State of Nevada.

In the injunction suit filed by the Six Companies (Inc.) to restrain the assessor of Clark County from the assessment on its property within the county, principally located at Boulder City, two principal grounds are cited:

First. That the State of Nevada has relinquished jurisdiction over certain territory in the said county of Clark designated by the Secretary of the Interior as Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, within which territory the property sought to be taxed is situated and its employees reside.

Second. That plaintiff is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government, hence its property used for the purpose of the construction of such dam, plant, and works is not subject to taxation by the authorities of the State of Nevada.

In regard to the question of relinquishing jurisdiction, the act of the State of Nevada which is cited in this case was passed in 1921, many years prior to the enactment of the Boulder Canyon project act, and therefore the Legislature of the State of Nevada could not have passed upon the question of jurisdiction of the land withdrawn by the Secretary of the Interior and which he has attempted to create as a reservation of exclusive jurisdiction. In the second place, there is no provision made either in the Boulder Canyon project act or in the reclamation laws or otherwise which gives the Secretary of the Interior authority to take advantage of a State statute. Where the land has not been acquired by the Government since the State entered the Union, as in this case, the general procedure, in accordance with precedent, demands independent action by the Congress of the United States in accepting a State's offer to cede jurisdiction and on the part of the State in providing for a cession of jurisdiction with regard to a specified area.

In order to expedite consideration, I addressed a letter to the Legislative Reference Bureau of the Senate on July 20, 1932, requesting that during the summer a thorough investigation be made of the constitutional and legal premises upon which the attempted creation by the Secretary of the Interior of the so-called Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation might be predicated. I submit this letter for the RECORD at this point and ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and inclosure were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 20, 1932.

Mr. CHARLES F. BOOTS,
Chief Legislative Reference Bureau,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOOTS: Inclosed herewith is a copy of S. 2885, which I introduced on January 7 for the purpose of conserving the jurisdiction of the State of Nevada in the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation with regard to taxation, the franchise, labor and mining laws, and penal laws of the State.

In my testimony before the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation I eliminated section 2 of the bill, and during the summer I shall greatly appreciate your cooperation in causing an investigation and report to be made with reference to the legal aspects of the bill which I have introduced, as above, showing as fully as possible the limitations under which the Secretary of the Interior may operate constitutionally to create a reservation under the Boulder Canyon project act which would in any way interfere with the application of State laws as above outlined to such reservation.

In connection with this investigation I am inclosing herewith the briefs which have been submitted by the United States Government as amicus curiæ, the State of Nevada, and the plaintiff, The Six Companies (Inc.), which have been filed in cases now pending before the District Court for the District of Nevada.

You are already familiar with the hearings which were conducted before the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and the testimony which was submitted, and this should be taken into consideration in your investigation of the subject.

It is my intention to press for early action on S. 2885 at the beginning of the next session of Congress, and it will be very helpful if your report can be made available at that time.

When they have served your purpose, I shall greatly appreciate your returning the briefs submitted by the State of Nevada.

Sincerely yours,

TASKER L. ODDIE.

S. 2885

A bill providing for the application of State laws within the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation

Be it enacted, etc., That the establishment by the Federal Government of the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation shall in no way interfere with the sovereign powers of the States of Nevada and Arizona (including their political subdivisions) within their respective boundaries with respect to (1) the taxation of persons and property, (2) the regulation and control of mining and other industries and employment therein, or (3) the service of process, civil or criminal, and the arrest and punishment of persons charged with offenses against the laws of such States, or with the right to vote of qualified residents on such reservation; and all persons and property within such reservation may be taxed and all industries and industrial employment within such reservation may be regulated and controlled by such States and their political subdivisions to the same extent as if such reservation had not been established: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to permit interference with the operations of the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of the Boulder Canyon project act.

Mr. ODDIE. In response to the above letter, a report was made under date of December 20, 1932, by the legislative reference bureau of the Senate, which I also submit for the RECORD. I ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM IN RE STATUS OF BOULDER CANYON PROJECT FEDERAL RESERVATION

This memorandum is submitted in response to your request for a report upon the legal status of the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, with a view to a consideration of the applicability therein of the tax, police, and other laws of the State of Nevada.

The Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation was created under the authority of the Boulder Canyon project act (45 Stat. 1057) out of lands within the public domain of the United States and owned by the United States at the time of admission of the State of Nevada into the Union. These lands have been reserved from entry, and purporting to act pursuant to authority claimed to be vested in him by the reclamation laws and the Boulder Canyon project act, and the Nevada statute (post) relating to the ceding of exclusive jurisdiction to the United States of lands within the State, the Secretary of the Interior has filed with the Governor of the State of Nevada a description and plat of the lands. By virtue of these acts the Secretary of the Interior claims that the United States now enjoys exclusive jurisdiction over the area included within the reservation. This contention has been challenged by the State.

TRANSFER OF POLITICAL JURISDICTION NECESSARY

Mere ownership by the Federal Government of lands within the Territorial limits of a State does not entitle it to more than the rights of an ordinary proprietor (United States v. Bateman (1888), 34 Fed. 86; Surplus Trading Co. v. Cook (1930), 281 U. S. 647), except that the State can not interfere with the use of the lands for governmental purposes (Pundt v. Pendleton (1909), N. D. Ga. 167 Fed. 997; United States v. Hunt (1927), D. Ariz. 19 F. (2d) 634). Unless there is a retention of political jurisdiction over such lands at the time of the State's admission into the Union such jurisdiction passes to the State, and thereafter the Federal Government can not recover political jurisdiction over such lands unless there is a transfer of such jurisdiction from the State to the United States; nor without such a transfer can the Federal Government acquire jurisdiction over new lands subsequently purchased by the United States (Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe (1885), 114 U. S. 525).

A transfer of political jurisdiction from a State to the United States over lands within the State may be effectuated either (1) in accordance with the provisions of the seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, granting to the Congress the power to exercise exclusive legislative authority "over all places purchased by the consent of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings;" or (2) pursuant to the recognized power of a State and the Federal Government to deal with each other in any way they may deem best to carry out the purposes of the Constitution. (Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe, supra; Chicago & Pacific Ry. Co. v. McGlinn (1885), 114 U. S. 542; Benson v. United States (1892), 146 U. S. 325; Palmer v. Barrett (1896), 162 U. S. 399; Battle v. United States (1908), 209 U. S. 36; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Chiles (1909), 214 U. S. 274; Arlington Hotel v. Fant (1929), 278 U. S. 439; United States v. Unzeuta (1930), 281 U. S. 138; Surplus Trading Co. v. Cook, supra.)

(1) Transfer under seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I

The seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I has been construed to cover only those cases where there has been an actual purchase of lands by the United States with the consent of the State in which they are located. This restricted construction was given to the clause by the Supreme Court nearly half a century ago in the case of Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe, supra, and, with the possible exception mentioned below, the construction adopted by the Lowe case has been uniformly indorsed. (Chicago & Pacific Ry. Co. v. McGlinn, supra; Benson v. United States, supra; United States v. Unzeuta, supra.) In the case last mentioned, which was decided in 1930, the court, in deciding whether the Federal Government had jurisdiction over a certain right of way through the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, in Nebraska, recognized this limitation placed upon the provision. The court said:

When the United States acquires title to lands, which are purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State within which they are situated "for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings" (Const. Art. I, sec. 8), the Federal jurisdiction is exclusive of all State authority. With reference to land otherwise acquired, this court said in Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S. 525, 539, 541, that a different rule applies, that is, that the land and the buildings erected thereon for the uses of the National Government will be free from any such interference and jurisdiction of the State as would impair their effective use for the purposes for which the property was acquired. When, in such cases, a State cedes jurisdiction to the United States, the State may impose conditions which are not inconsistent with the carrying out of the purposes of the acquisition. (Citing cases.) The terms of the cession, to the extent that they may lawfully be prescribed, determine the extent of the Federal jurisdiction (p. 142).

If it were not for a single sentence in the case of Arlington Hotel Co. v. Fant, supra, there apparently would not exist even the slightest doubt but that this constitutional provision does not include a case where land is owned by the United States prior to the creation of the State. The Arlington Hotel case involved the following set of facts: The plaintiff lost property in the Arlington Hotel fire. The hotel was located within the Hot Springs Reservation. The plaintiff claimed that the State statute destroying the common-law liability of hotel keepers did not apply to the Arlington Hotel Co. because it was under the jurisdiction of the United States. The Arkansas statute ceding jurisdiction reserved to the State the right of taxation, and the defendant claimed that therefore the cession was a nullity because not exclusive. In upholding the plaintiff's contention the court relied upon the distinction set forth in the Lowe case, affirmed the principle of the case to the effect that reservations can be made in the ceding statute in cases not arising under the seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I, declared that the case before it was covered by that principle, that therefore the cession of jurisdiction was valid, and then throws in the following observation: "This justified acquisition of the springs and hospital for the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States under clause 17, section 8, Article I of the Constitution" (p. 455). But since this statement is clearly out of line with Supreme Court decisions before and since and inconsistent with the rest of the opinion in the case itself, it would seem reasonable to conclude that the court did not thereby intend to overthrow a well-recognized principle applicable for many years to the relations of the Federal Government and the States; and that in any case where the lands involved are not actually purchased by the Federal Government subsequent to the admission of the State, transfer of jurisdiction over such lands from the State to the Federal Government can not be effectuated in accordance with the seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I, but must be pursuant to the general power under the Constitution of the two sovereignties to deal with each other for any constitutional purpose. It has even been held that a case does not fall under the seventeenth clause even though there be an actual purchase by the Federal Government, if the consent of the State is not obtained until after the acquisition of the land (Palmer v. Barrett, supra).

It would seem therefore that, since the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation is composed of lands originally owned by the United States and not purchased subsequent to the admission of the State, transfer of jurisdiction over such lands from the State to the Federal Government can not be held to have been effectuated in accordance with the seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I, but, if at all, must have been pursuant to the general constitutional power.

(2) Transfer under general constitutional power

In determining whether or not there has been a transfer under the general constitutional power two major questions must be answered:

1. Has there been a cession of jurisdiction by the State? and
2. Has there been an acceptance of jurisdiction by the Federal Government?

1. Has there been a cession of jurisdiction by the State? The answer to this question depends upon the construction of the Nevada statute of February 24, 1921, which provides as follows:

"SECTION 1. The consent of the State of Nevada is hereby given, in accordance with the seventeenth clause, eighth section, of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, to the acquisition by the United States, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of any land in this State which has been, or may hereafter be, acquired for sites for customhouses, courthouses, post offices, arsenals, or other public buildings whatever, or for any other purpose of the Government.

"SEC. 2. The exclusive jurisdiction in and over any land so acquired by the United States shall be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the United States for all purposes, except the service upon such sites of all civil and criminal process of the courts of this State, but the jurisdiction so ceded shall continue not longer than the said United States shall own such lands: Provided, That an accurate description and plat of such lands so acquired, verified by the oath of some officer of the General Government having knowledge of the fact, shall be filed with the governor of this State.

"SEC. 3. The jurisdiction hereby ceded shall not vest until the United States shall have acquired the title to the said lands by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise; and so long as the said lands shall remain the property of the United States when acquired as aforesaid, and no longer, the same shall be and continue exempt and exonerated from all State, county, and municipal assessment, tax, or other charges which may be levied or imposed under the authority of this State.

"SEC. 4. Those certain acts entitled 'An act ceding the jurisdiction of this State over certain lands owned by the United States,' approved January 18, 1883, and 'An act ceding the jurisdiction of this State over certain lands to be acquired by the United States,' approved February 24, 1885, are hereby repealed."

It is submitted that by reason of the ambiguity in the statute no very definite conclusions can be drawn upon its application to the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation. Nor are we benefited by any suggestion arising in the course of the legislative history of the statute; whether any records from which the history of the legislation may be traced exist, does not appear. It has been seen that since the reservation is composed of lands originally owned by the United States, the transfer of jurisdiction could not be effectuated in accordance with the seventeenth clause of section 8 of Article I. If, therefore, the statute is construed to be limited to cases falling within clause 17, except in so far as it expressly includes cases falling outside of clause 17, it is clear that no cession of jurisdiction over the reservation has been effectuated, since there is no express inclusion within the scope of the statute of cases involving lands within the State owned by the United States prior to the admission of the State. Although the statute is expressly extended beyond the limits of clause 17, in so far as it applies to lands acquired prior to the enactment of the statute (see Palmer v. Barrett, supra), it is limited to lands acquired with the consent of the State; and it would seem hardly justifiable in any event to construe this provision to apply to acquisition of land by the Federal Government prior to the existence of the State, when the State as such had no capacity to give or withhold consent.

If, on the other hand, the statute is construed to include any case falling within the general constitutional power, which construction would seem to require either that the reference in the statute to the seventeenth clause be treated as a nullity or that the statute be construed as if it had been expressed in the alternative, dealing with cases falling either under the seventeenth clause or under the general power, then it is equally clear that a cession of jurisdiction to the Federal Government has been effectuated by the Nevada statute, so far as the requirements on the part of the State are concerned.

Arguments may be propounded in favor of either interpretation, but, like most cases involving the interpretation of ambiguous statutes, the proper interpretation will remain a matter of conjecture until the statute is passed upon by the courts. On the one hand, it might be argued that although reference is made in the statute to the seventeenth clause, the fact that the rest of the statute openly disregards the recognized limitations of that clause is sufficient to prove lack of an intention to restrict the scope of the statute by reference to that clause; and that although in form the statute is not set forth in the alternative, nevertheless as a whole it indicates that the legislature contemplated cases of governmental operations within the State generally, whether carried on on lands acquired by the United States before the creation of the State or thereafter.

In favor of the more limited construction, however, equally as forceful arguments can be propounded, and perhaps more tangible. It is an accepted canon in the construction of powers between the Nation and the State that the rights of sovereignty are never to be taken away by implication. (See In re Kelly (1895) 71 Fed. 545.) From this it may well be argued that since the intention of the State legislature to include all cases arising under the general constitutional power is not expressed, the statute can not be given the effect of including such cases. Moreover, adoption of the broader interpretation in the face of such a principle of construction becomes even more questionable in view of the results that might flow therefrom in this particular instance. It is estimated that nearly 90 per cent of all the land situated within the State of Nevada belongs to the Federal Government. Under the provisions of the Nevada statute, an administrative officer of the Federal Government (acting within the scope of his authority) may file the documents required by the statute, with respect to any such lands, and, other provisions of the statute having been complied with, the United States would acquire exclusive jurisdiction of such lands. In effect, such a construction of the Nevada statute would impute to the legislature of the State an intention to throw almost 90 per cent of the area of the State open to the possible acquisition of exclusive jurisdiction by the Federal Government, by virtue of a simple ministerial act, and thus place the State almost at the mercy of the Federal Government with respect to the regulation of the State's internal affairs and the exercise of its police and taxing powers.

The danger in any such construction is at once seen if we consider the powers of the officer whose action has been challenged with respect to the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation. The Secretary of the Interior under section 3 of the reclamation act of 1902 is given authority to withdraw lands needed for irrigation projects, and section 10 of the reclamation act authorizes the Secretary to perform any and all acts which may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act. It is assumed that the Legislature of Nevada was cognizant of this provision of Federal law when it enacted the statute of 1921; and it would seem to be flying in the face of the principle that sovereignty is not to be taken away by implication to impute to the Legislature of Nevada an intention to give the Secretary of the Interior authority by the act of filing certain maps to assume jurisdiction over the greater part of the area of the State, however remote may be the probability of any such action being taken.

It is therefore believed that since there is no express inclusion in the statute of cases involving lands within a State owned by the United States prior to the admission of the State, exclusive jurisdiction over the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation has not been ceded to the United States under the Nevada statute.

However, whatever may be the correct interpretation of the Nevada statute with respect to action by the State, there still remains the other side of the equation, namely, the question of acceptance of jurisdiction on the part of the United States.

2. Has there been an acceptance of jurisdiction on the part of the United States? In the light of decided cases it can not be argued that a Federal statute of acceptance is necessary where the State ceding statute is unconditional. Since the statute confers a benefit, acceptance on the part of the United States is to be presumed in the absence of dissent on its part. (Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe, supra; Chicago & Pacific Ry. Co. v. McGlinn, supra; Benson v. United States, supra.) It does not follow, however, that Federal legislation is never necessary in order to complete the transfer. For example, where the State statute requires acceptance on the part of the Federal Government, it seems clear that the Federal Government must act in order to complete the transfer. (See State ex rel. Grays Harbor Construction Co. v. Department of Labor and Industries (Wash., 1932), 10 Pac. (2d) 213.) Or if the State statute provides that jurisdiction will not be ceded until a plat of the lands is filed by a duly authorized Federal official, it is clear that such action would have to be taken by an authorized official before the transfer could be completed.

The cession, then, of the State of Nevada, if there was a cession, can not be said to be unconditional. It requires an act of acceptance on the part of the Federal Government. It has been seen that the provisions of the reclamation law give to the Secretary of the Interior broad authority to withdraw lands for the purpose of those laws, and section 10 of the reclamation act authorizes the Secretary to perform any and all acts necessary for the purposes of that act. Also section 14 of the Boulder Canyon project act provides that the reclamation laws shall apply to the construction of the project.

Do these provisions give to the Secretary authority to go so far as to bring about the establishment of a reservation subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or in other words, to accept exclusive jurisdiction on behalf of the United States in accordance with Nevada law? In the first place, it would seem that on such extreme action would be necessary so as to justify resort to the doctrine of "necessity" to sustain the action of the Secretary of the Interior. No case has been found in the 30 years' administration of the reclamation act of 1902 where the Secretary of the Interior has felt justified in resorting to any such attempted exercise of power, and projects at least approaching in magnitude the Boulder Canyon project have been prosecuted successfully under the reclamation laws. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that even in the absence of any exclusive jurisdiction in the Federal Government a State can not interfere with the use of Government lands for governmental purposes. So that no act that might be taken by the State of Nevada with respect to the Boulder Canyon project act, which in any way interfered with the operations of the Government, could be sustained. See cases cited, supra. No question has apparently been made as to the authority of the Secretary to establish a reservation, not under exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The law can easily be construed to justify such action, obviously a necessary step in a vast reclamation project. The only dispute arises as to whether, in so doing, the Secretary may vest exclusive jurisdiction over the area in the United States.

Referring again to the principle that the rights of sovereignty will not be taken away by implication, this principle should be just as applicable as a limitation upon the acceptance of jurisdiction on the part of the Government as upon the cession of jurisdiction on the part of the State. Broad general language in statutes authorizing a course of action by administrative officers with respect to arid lands and seeking to permit carrying out of minute details of finance, engineering, agriculture, and what not, over a period of many years, would not seem to grant any authority to that officer to go so far as to accept, if he deems it wise, exclusive jurisdiction for the Federal Government over lands within the boundaries of a sovereign State; and certainly there was no express language in the reclamation laws or the Boulder Canyon project act which granted any such authority.

Mention should be made of the case of United States v. Watkins (1927, D. C., N. D., Cal., S. D.), 22 F. (2d) 437, in which it was held that a provision of the California statute requiring recordation of a map as a condition of cession of exclusive jurisdiction of certain lands to the United States was complied with by recording by a judge advocate of the United States Army of an official map of the War Department. It was stated that the condition of the cession (filing of the map) might be complied with by a subordinate officer under the general authority given the Secretary of War to conduct the business of the War Department in such manner as the President shall direct, and that in the absence of a statute or regulation to the contrary the acts done would be presumed to have been done at the direction and by the authority of the President. It appears from the decision in that case that the Congress had subsequent to the cession declared by law that the United States had exclusive jurisdiction and this had been acquiesced in and accepted by the action of the State of California; so that the case is not a final decision upon the sufficiency of the recordation under a general act as an acceptance of the State cession. Further the case involves the case of a military reservation, peculiarly the subject for exercise of exclusive jurisdiction, and accordingly acceptance is more easily to be presumed. This is quite a different situation than that present in the instant case where is involved immediately jurisdiction over a comparatively large area, and potentially jurisdiction over nearly 90 per cent of the area of the State of Nevada.

It is accordingly believed that, assuming a valid cession on the part of the State of Nevada, the cession would obviously be a conditional one, requiring acceptance on the part of the United States; and that such an acceptance was not consummated by the acts of the Secretary of the Interior above described, there being no authority in that official to act in that regard for the United States.

With respect to the application of State laws within Federal reservations the law is fairly well settled.

Thus, should it be held that the United States enjoys exclusive jurisdiction over the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation, that jurisdiction must be exclusive of all State action; except that laws intended for the protection of private rights (affecting the possession, use, and transfer of property and designed to secure good order and peace in the community and promote its health and prosperity) would remain in force after the transfer of jurisdiction unless inconsistent with existing Federal laws or thereafter superseded by Federal law. (Chicago & Pacific Ry. Co. v. McGlinn (supra); Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Chiles (supra); Surplus Trading Co. v. Arkansas (supra); Crook, Horner & Co. v. Old Point Comfort Hotel Co. (C. C., E. D., Va., 1893), 54 Fed. 604.) Congress has already enacted an extensive criminal code for places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States providing that where an offense is not specially provided for by any law of the United States, it shall be prosecuted in the courts of the United States and receive the same punishment prescribed by the laws of the State in which the place is situated for like offenses committed within its jurisdiction. (Criminal Code, secs. 272, 282, 311, U. S. C., title 18, secs. 451, 468, 511.) It has, however, provided no laws for the Government in civil matters of the inhabitants of such areas. Accordingly, they are without laws in civil matters, except such general laws as may have been in force in the States from which the United States acquired them at the time of acquisition. (See Old Point Comfort case (supra).)

On the other hand (and in view of the conclusions reached in this memorandum the general principles stated here must apply), since there is no exclusive jurisdiction over the area in question, it is a part of the territory of the State and her laws, civil and criminal, have the same force and effect there as elsewhere within her limits; except that such laws can have no operation which would interfere with or impair the effective use of the reservation for the purposes for which it is maintained (see cases cited above, and on the latter point, cases cited in preliminary discussion under "Transfer of Political Jurisdiction Necessary"). It should be noted here that it apparently has not been contended, nor, having in mind the language of the Nevada statute, could it be, that there has been any cession by Nevada short of exclusive jurisdiction.

In view of these considerations, with the exception above noted to the effect that the area within the reservation must be free from such interference or exercise of jurisdiction by the State of Nevada as would impair its effective use for the purposes for which set apart by the Federal Government, the portion of the Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation lying within the State of Nevada is territory of the State of Nevada and over it the power of the State is as full and complete as over any other territory within her boundaries.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES F. BOOTS,
Legislative Counsel.

HON. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate.

DECEMBER 20, 1932.

Mr. ODDIE. This report indicates that the Secretary is acting without precedent and without adequate constitutional and legal authority.

One of the strongest points brought out in this brief is the fact that the land in question which the Secretary of the Interior seeks to create as an exclusive Federal jurisdiction reservation belonged to the Government prior to the admission of the State of Nevada into the Union. When the State of Nevada was created this land immediately became subject to the sovereignty of the State. If the Secretary of the Interior were acting under adequate constitutional and statutory authority he could have in his discretion included all of the Federal domain in the State of Nevada in this reservation, and, according to the construction placed upon this act by the Secretary, all private property within this area would not be taxable by the counties and State in which the land is situated. Approximately 90 per cent of the State of Nevada is in public domain and this fact further emphasizes the absurdity of the Secretary's position. One is forced to conclude that the attempt by the Secretary of the Interior to create an exclusive Federal jurisdiction reservation was made in the interest of relieving the Six Companies (Inc.), of the necessity for paying taxes to Clark County and the State of Nevada, and, therefore, of aiding a private enterprise to unjustly fatten itself at the expense of the public welfare.

The second ground upon which the Six Companies (Inc.), relies in evading the tax laws of the State of Nevada is the fact that the company constitutes an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government and that hence its property used for the construction of such dam, plant, and works is not subject to taxation by the authorities of the State of Nevada.

The Secretary of the Interior has stated that it was not his intention to create a permanent tax-exempt reservation at Boulder City, and I quote from his letter to Senator THOMAS of May 5, 1932, as follows:

> The question of the power of the State of Nevada to tax personal property for franchise within the reservation, and to impose its own mining regulations on the construction of the Government diversion tunnels, is now before the Federal courts. Pending the outcome of this litigation, we have suggested that the question of taxation remain in abeyance. This has given rise to some purported fears by local residents that we intend to create a permanent tax-exempt reservation which will attract industries which otherwise would locate in taxable areas of Nevada. The status of the reservation after completion of construction can be determined at that time by Congress. Obviously the purpose of creating the reservation was to facilitate the construction of the dam and not to exempt from taxation permanent industries not connected with the task of construction or the furnishing of supplies.

The Boulder Canyon project act has been tested in the case of Arizona against California and was held by the Supreme Court to be constitutional as a project for the improvement of navigation.

It has been held by the Supreme Court that the property of a company which is brought within a jurisdiction solely for the purpose of performing a contract with the Federal Government for the improvement of navigation may be taxed by such jurisdiction and that such taxation is considered not to be an unconstitutional interference with the operations of a Federal instrumentality. (Gromer v. Standard Dredging Co., 224 U. S. 362, 371.)

Since the Boulder Canyon project act was considered constitutional as a project for the improvement of navigation, and since the case above cited was also predicated upon an improvement in navigation, the circumstances under which the Boulder Canyon is being improved are similar.

The principal factor to emphasize in the case of Gromer against Standard Dredging Co. is that the Supreme Court upheld the right to tax a company and did not regard the exercise of this right as an unconstitutional interference with the operation of a Federal instrumentality.

Even under the general rules governing statutory interpretation, there would seem to be no basis for construing the Boulder Canyon project act as containing any authorization, but since in this case the question of interference with State sovereignty is involved, no such authority can be implied unless such an implication were to appear as clearly intended by Congress. Had Congress intended to relieve the Six Companies (Inc.), of the payment of State and local taxes, it would have been necessary for Congress clearly to have expressed such an intention in the Boulder Canyon project act.

In assuming the position that the Secretary of the Interior has enunciated in his letter of May 5 to Senator THOMAS, it seems obvious that (1) he disagrees with the Supreme Court in holding that the taxation of a company does not constitute an interference with a Federal instrumentality, or (2) he agrees with the Supreme Court but is frankly operating in behalf of the Six Companies (Inc.). In either event, the Secretary would seem to be acting without adequate statutory authority.

The Las Vegas Chamber of Commerce, in a brief filed with the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation as of August 29, 1932, on the question of taxation of private property on the Boulder Canyon Project Federal Reservation, set forth the valuation of the Six Companies (Inc.), and the amount of taxation due thereon for the years 1931 and 1932. The actual valuation of the Six Companies (Inc.), for the year 1931 was $406,534. The assessed valuation was 50 per cent, or $203,267, and at the tax rate prevailing in 1931 there was due $6,880.58. The Six Companies (Inc.), in 1932 had an actual valuation of $4,659,138 and an assessed valuation of $2,329,569, and at the rate of taxation charged in 1932 there would be due in taxation $79,088.86. None of the above taxes have been paid, the Six Companies (Inc.) having procured an injunction against the county assessor and tax collector, with the aid of the Secretary of the Interior, the Federal court for the district of Nevada, the counsel representing the Attorney General, and the Reclamation Service, each as amicus curiæ, restraining his collection of the same.

At the same time that Clark County, the city of Las Vegas, and the State of Nevada were deprived of the above taxes from the Six Companies (Inc.), additional costs due to the large influx of labor, a large part of which could not secure employment, and the need for providing schools were met by Clark County and the city of Las Vegas, as quoted from the brief of the Las Vegas Chamber of Commerce of August 29, 1932, as follows:

PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Upon the assurance of the Department of Interior that the dam workers would use the facilities of the city of Las Vegas for housing and schooling, the city caused to be constructed a school building at the expense to the city and county of $350,000. Prior to the determination of the Government to build the dam, the present school facilities in the city and country were adequate to take care of local school conditions. During the fiscal year ending July, 1932, the Boulder City school children used the Las Vegas school facilities. The proportionate share of the cost for such residents of Boulder City exclusive of any building cost or maintenance or amortization charges was for the high-school pupils $13,000, and for the grammar-school pupils $16,000. The fact that Boulder City has inadequate school facilities or that the proposed tuition may be too burdensome, we will probably have to continue to care for many of the Boulder City school pupils in future years.

PUBLIC EXPENSE

The influx of people attracted by the dam has necessitated the increase of the police department from 2 to 12 men at a monthly salary of $175 per man. This means $21,000 annually additional burden upon the city. This does not take into consideration the extra equipment and facilities such as four motor vehicles used by the department, etc., and the expense of maintaining such equipment which would probably exceed $5,000 per year.

Conditions in the community are pretty accurately reflected by the comparative expense of the police department for the year 1929 and the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1931, and ending June 30, 1932. For instance, the cost of the department, including the care of prisoners for the year 1931, was $18,023.35; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, it was $40,032.04, an increase of $22,008.69. Assuming this condition will continue six years, the duration of the construction, it will cost the city in excess of $132,000 additional for policing alone.

INDIGENTS

The police tell us that, based upon a very conservative estimate, there is an average minimum of 4,000 unemployed male persons in Clark County attracted by the dam construction, many of them looking for employment, many of them common vagrants and what not; that 75 per cent of these people are entirely destitute and look to the community for their support; that 40 cents a day is a minimum amount upon which one can subsist whether he steals it, begs it, or receives it through voluntary donations, which results in an added expense to the community in excess of $73,000 per annum, exclusive of the financial burden heretofore and hereafter mentioned.

In 1929 there was a total indigent cost to the county of $14,339.83. For the year 1931 this expense had increased to the sum of $39,471.01, making a total increase of $25,131.18. During 1931 the county of Clark was required to borrow $20,000 as an emergency indigent fund. In addition to the foregoing the local chapter of the Red Cross, supported entirely by local subscription, expended during the months of November and December, 1931, the sum of $2,948.37, at the monthly rate of $1,474.

It must be borne in mind in connection with the subject of indigents that the publicity given the project has attracted to the community many thousands of persons, some of whom are honestly looking for employment. However, it matters not how honest they are; if they are destitute, they must live. It has attracted many undesirables, racketeers, and what have you who usually follow projects of this kind and who might be termed as "leeches" upon the community. It has attracted many infirm and indigent people who must be supported by the community, and it is important to bear in mind that the reservation shares none of these detriments, because he can not enter the reservation without he has employment or has a pass, and secondly, when his employment ceases if he does not leave the reservation he is ejected therefrom, thereby pouring all of these people—good and bad—upon our civil community for support.

ELECTION EXPENSE

The total number of registered voters in Clark County is 8,034. Twenty-three per cent, or 1,858, live in Boulder City. It is estimated that the primary and general election will cost $8,000, or Boulder City's share of expense of $1,840.

HIGHWAY MAINTENANCE

During the year 1931 the county of Clark, State of Nevada, expended the sum of $7,067 upon the maintenance of the highway leading from Boulder City to Las Vegas, which was $5,000 in excess of the amount expended the preceding year.

COUNTY JUDICIAL (THIS INCLUDES CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS AND COURT EXPENSES IN CRIMINAL CASES)

In the year 1929 this item amounted to $8,801.92. The corresponding item for the year 1931 was $24,245.03, making a net increase on account of this department of government of $13,443.17. The residents of Boulder City have enjoyed the benefits of the courts and government agencies and facilities, thereby enhancing the expense of this department of the local government.

PROTECTION (SHERIFF'S OFFICE IN ADDITION TO POLICE DEPARTMENT)

Protection cost the county, in the year 1929, $15,768.58 and in the year 1931, $22,803.75, making a net increase to administer this department of the government $7,035.17.

INQUESTS

During the period intervening since the Six Companies started operations on their contract there have been 20 coroner's inquests held by the coroner of Las Vegas Township, Clark County, over the bodies of persons residing upon the reservation, at a total expense to Clark County of $1,074.05.

These additional expenses totaled $241,522, an amount which must be added annually to the financial burden of Clark County and the city of Las Vegas. This amounts to an increase of approximately 31.5 per cent in the tax rate, which illustrates the great extent to which Las Vegas and Clark County have been subjected to unjust expenses through the failure of the Six Companies (Inc.) to pay its legal taxes to the county and the State.

The injunction suit to restrain the mine inspector of the State of Nevada from enforcing the mine safety laws of Nevada was presented before the Federal court for the district of Nevada, comprised of Wilbur and Sawtelle, circuit judges; Norcross, district judge, as a statutory court; and Norcross, district judge. In reviewing the decision of the district judge, Frank H. Norcross filed May 31, 1932, in the case in which the Six Companies (Inc.) asked for an injunction against the assessor of the county of Clark from collecting the taxes on its property, I quote the following statements:

> The two questions of law involved in this case were also presented in the case of Six Companies (Inc.) v. Stinson, as inspector of mines, et al., instituted in this court and recently decided by a statutory court of three judges upon the question of the issuance of a temporary injunction. * * *
> While not as clear as in the Stinson case, the court is of the opinion that a temporary injunction should issue as prayed for, pending trial and determination upon the merits. The defendant, and the interests he represents, can be fully protected by bond. The fact that this case involves questions raised in the Stinson case is a further reason why the application for a temporary injunction should be granted. The case has been set for a definite date for trial.

From these statements it is clear that District Judge Norcross very largely predicated his action in granting the motion of the Six Companies (Inc), for a temporary injunction against the tax collector on the findings by the district court in the Stinson case.

It would appear that this attempt, without adequate constitutional and legal authority by the Secretary of the Interior, to create a reservation of exclusive Federal jurisdiction had been made for the purpose of aiding the Six Companies (Inc.) to escape the payment of its just taxes to the county of Clark and the State of Nevada. It is obvious that these cases, thrown into court, will require time to adjudicate, possibly the entire period the Six Companies (Inc.) will be engaged in the construction of the Hoover Dam, and the State will ultimately and through these devious legal processes, be substantially deprived of its rightful tax income. It is also obvious that whatever the county of Clark and the State of Nevada lose because of the tax income of which it has been deprived will result in an excess profit to the Six Companies (Inc.) to which it is not justly entitled. In no way will the loss to the State result in a benefit to the Federal Government. The contract was entered into by the Government and the Six Companies (Inc.) on March 11, 1931, and the estimates submitted at that time included costs of labor and material which have been greatly reduced since then. In considering the gains which the company would make through the nonpayment of taxes to Clark County and the State of Nevada, it would, because of economic conditions which have changed, net a superprofit far in excess of the one upon which the company predicated its bid.

Under these conditions, and considering the heavy expenses which the city of Las Vegas and Clark County and the State of Nevada have been compelled to bear because of the additional responsibilities involved in connection with the construction of Hoover Dam, it is doubly important that the resolution which I have introduced to investigate conditions at Hoover Dam (S. Res. 293) be immediately acted upon and the investigation begun in order to prevent a continuation of these evils. Not only is the State of Nevada damaged by this procedure adopted by the Secretary of the Interior in attempting without adequate statutory authority to create an exclusive Federal jurisdiction reservation, but a precedent is being established upon which the future development of a large number of Federal projects will be affected, together with all of the States in which they are located.

Furthermore, the attempt of the Secretary of the Interior to aid the Six Companies (Inc.), on the basis that it is a Government instrumentality creates another precedent which would affect the entire status of Federal construction work in the United States, whatever its nature might be.

It is therefore very important, from a national standpoint, to stop this procedure at the earliest moment and rectify the conditions in so far as possible.

III. BUSINESS MONOPOLY AND "SWEATING" LABOR

Many complaints have been made of the methods and policies of the Six Companies (Inc.) and its subsidiary, the Boulder City Co., in creating a business monopoly and exploiting and "sweating" the labor in its employ. Boulder City is located within the area which the Secretary of the Interior has attempted to set aside as an exclusive Federal jurisdiction, and is fenced in and guarded by Federal police officers, so that no one can either enter or leave without permission and knowledge of the manager of the city, appointed by the Secretary. Under the contract with the Six Companies (Inc.) the Secretary of the Interior authorizes that company to operate a commissary to supply the men in its employ with living necessaries, to lease ground, and to erect houses for their occupation. In addition, the Secretary of the Interior, under his control over the management of Boulder City, licenses business of all kinds to operate.

The Six Companies (Inc.) issues paper scrip and token coins which its employees are forced to accept between regular pay days and which are redeemable at face value in merchandise only at the department store owned and operated by its subsidiary, the Boulder City Co., organized April 6, 1931. Complaint has been made by the business houses licensed by the Secretary of the Interior to do business in Boulder City that this scrip operates to their disadvantage and destroys competition, thereby establishing the Boulder City Co. as a powerful monopoly in winning all the available trade of the employees of the Six Companies (Inc.).

Complaints have been made also by the business men of Las Vegas that the issuance of scrip by the Six Companies (Inc.) also enables the Boulder City Co., its subsidiary, to take a large part of the business which they would otherwise get and to which they are entitled. Las Vegas, the county seat of Clark County, has borne the brunt of the fight from the beginning in securing the enactment of the Boulder Canyon project legislation and is, therefore, entitled to a fair opportunity to benefit from the increased business. Las Vegas is only 22 miles distant from Boulder City, and if this scrip was redeemable in cash at its face value, the stores at Las Vegas would be able to compete for a good share of the business of the employees of the Six Companies (Inc.) engaged in building Hoover Dam.

That the Six Companies (Inc.) will not redeem the scrip it issues at par except in merchandise at the store of its subsidiary, the Boulder City Co., is evidenced by a letter addressed to the manager of Boulder City by the president of the Boulder City Commercial Association, under date of April 28, 1932, which I herewith present for the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOULDER CITY, NEV., April 28, 1932.

MR. SIMS ELY,
Manager Boulder City, Nev.

DEAR MR. ELY: Referring to the letter from Mr. Felix Kohn, of the Boulder City Co., proposing a scheme which would supposedly relieve the scrip situation for the independent merchant in Boulder City, we regret to advise you that we see no relief whatsoever in this proposed procedure for the following reasons:

(1) Accounting difficulties of Boulder City Co. tremendously increased.

(2) Intimidation or embarrassment of employees.

(3) Actual difficulty of operation of such a scheme.

(4) Gives the Boulder City Co. too close a scrutiny of our prices.

(5) Eliminates entirely from relief such business as that of Mr. Laubach, where purchases are exceedingly small and extemporaneous.

Summing up the proposal seems to us exceedingly impractical and almost impossible of application.

It has been said that the major objections on the part of the Boulder City Co. toward the redemption of scrip for cash are: (1) The added accounting difficulties entailed in checking it back and paying for it. (2) The increased danger of having to contend with counterfeit scrip tickets.

We submit here below a proposal which we sincerely believe substantially minimizes one objection and entirely eliminates the other. Our proposal is this:

We will delegate one of our number or a responsible person of our selection to act as a clearing agent for all of the scrip which we may be called upon to accept for merchandise or service in the conduct of our business, this agent to act as a depository for scrip for all of us; to carefully count and bundle this paper and on stipulated days of each month to take said scrip to the cashier of the Boulder City Co., check it in to them, and receive their check for the amount.

This would, as you can readily see, reduce their accounting in this regard to an absolute minimum.

In order to protect them in so far as the scrip which we handle against counterfeiting, we would agree that each of us would indorse with his own stamp such scrip as we may have received, thereby accepting individually the responsibility for its validity, which would as you can readily see relieve the Boulder City Co. of any danger of counterfeit scrip's getting back to them through our operation.

We would further agree that should at any time any member of this organization be proven to be trafficking in scrip by discounting it in Las Vegas or obtaining it in any other manner than the legitimate conduct of his business, said member would be immediately expelled from this organization and denied the privilege of clearing any scrip through this agency.

We sincerely hope that you can see the fairness of this proposal and will use your influence in helping us have it adopted. We are all enthusiatic about our small town and are convinced that with an even break we are going to be able to make a reasonable living here.

Thanking you for your cooperation in this matter, we are

Yours very truly,

BOULDER CITY COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION,
By BILL HARRISON, President.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, there are five objections to the issuance of this scrip by the Six Companies (Inc.), cited in the foregoing letter, as follows:

First. Accounting difficulties of Boulder City Co. tremendously increased.

Second. Intimidation or embarrassment of employees.

Third. Actual difficulty of operation of such a scheme.

Fourth. Gives the Boulder City Co. too close a scrutiny of prices of independent merchants.

Fifth. Eliminates entirely from relief business where purchases are exceedingly small and extemporaneous.

Further complaint of the business men operating under licenses of the Secretary of the Interior against the issuance of limited scrip by the Six Companies (Inc.) is evidenced by a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior by the president of the Boulder City Commercial Association under date of May 6, 1932, which I now place in the RECORD:

BOULDER CITY, NEV., May 6, 1932.

Hon. RAY LYMAN WILBUR,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Prior to the recent organization of permittees of Boulder City, individual letters have gone out to Members of Congress, complaining of the refusal of Six Companies to redeem scrip brought in by the merchants of Boulder City for cash.

Since that time Mr. Ely, in a very persuasive letter, requested that consideration be given the merchants of Boulder City in that regard. This request was denied by Mr. Felix Kohn, chairman of the Boulder City Co. This refusal makes it generally and definitely clear that their policy is unfavorable.

At this time we wish clearly to state that at the time of application for permits in our various lines of business applicants were given to understand through bulletins accompanying application blanks that the contractors were operating boarding houses, a recreation hall, and a commissary, and that they were issuing scrip. Little did we realize, however, that the commissary, providing for the necessities of employees, would expand rapidly into an enormous department store and concession stand, containing not less than 32 departments, with the apparently very definite object of supplying as much of their merchandise as possible to their own employees or any one else in the market for merchandise of any kind. A recent advertisement carried a notice: "Parking space for out-of-town customers"; so their policy seems to be one of exploitation, with no particular limitations as to where their trade may come from.

Their prices to-day are fair. But they are materially lower on numerous items than they were before the permittees commenced to operate, which indicates that competition was instrumental in lowering their prices, rather than a desire on their part to serve employees on as small a margin of profit as possible.

In addition to subsistence facilities at the regular boarding house, which seems very satisfactory and complete, meals are served at the recreation hall and at the counter in the drug store. These lunch counters also accept scrip, which naturally gives them a tremendous patronage, and which in turn seriously affects the business of restaurants and eating places operating under permits.

Our association has only praise for the officials of the Reclamation Bureau on this project. They have worked with zeal in the interest of permittees. Their efforts in our behalf are not to be minimized in so far as their power to interpret the contractor's contract is concerned. We realize that a suitable policy to all is no small task on their part.

A point we feel necessary to express at this time is that the paramount purpose of Six Companies is to build the Hoover Dam. Their profits should come from this source. Their policy, the exploitation of their subsidiary company, the Boulder City Co., with the advantages of having control of the pay roll, and of the issuance of scrip, redeemable only at company owned and controlled counters, is manifestly unfair, and must be regulated and restricted with a firm hand, for we do not believe that the Government intended, in entering into a contract for the construction of Hoover Dam, that the clause providing for the commissary should be so elastic and so broad as to reach the size of the present institution they now operate.

Picture, if you will, this model Government construction city; within its limits a huge department store and recreation hall selling drugs, ladies' ready-to-wear, dry goods, men's and women's dress shoes, men's work clothing, ready-to-wear men's suits, jewelry and jewelry novelties, furniture, hardware, shoe repairing, electrical supplies, Frigidaires, meats, groceries, tailoring and cleaning shop, soda fountain and lunch, two cigar stands, two lunch counters, soft-drink bar, laundry agency, barber shop, pool tables, an ice depot, and other departments found in a huge store. We believe that this store has expanded far in excess of original intention of a commissary, and that their activities should be curtailed within a reasonable limit.

A contract that is unfair is unsatisfactory, and should be revised. In article 15 of the Government's contract with Six Companies (Inc.) we read: "Except as otherwise specifically provided in this contract, all disputes concerning questions of fact arising under the contract shall be decided by the contracting officer or his duly authorized representative, subject to written appeal by the contractor within 30 days to the head of the department concerned, whose decision shall be final and conclusive upon the parties thereto as to such questions of fact." This clause indicates to us that the chief engineer has the authority to decide just what the interpretation of the word "commissary" shall be and to what extent the Boulder City Co. shall enlarge upon it.

We are willing to compete with Boulder City Co. on an even basis. In our letter of April 28 to Mr. Ely our proposal in method of handling scrip covers fully any objections that may be made against it; there are no other objections of merit. Only the desire of having every cent of scrip issued spent at the company owned or controlled counters keeps the Boulder City Co., subsidiary of Six Companies (Inc.), from accepting in full our proposal. The Six Companies' employees will have a better feeling if they can be free in selecting their own shopping store. Our request to you to make this possible is a minor one for Six Companies to grant. You have power to arrange it, and the responsibility of the success or failure of the permittees here will largely rest on what relief can be given in the immediate future.

A matter of great importance, which was called to the attention of Doctor Mead and has on various occasions been brought to the attention of Mr. Ely, is that of intimidation, both of employees and sources of supply of merchandise. Intimidation of employees is a difficult matter to prove except at the expense of some man's job. Intimidation of purveyors of merchandise into refusing to do business with the independents has been practiced in various instances of which we have unqualified proof. This we know you will agree is unfair practice.

At a meeting of our association with Doctor Mead on his last visit to the project he personally learned from us of the situation here, so he is in a position to know every angle, and we trust you will find in conference with him that our request for relief has a solid foundation and that we may have your cooperation in bringing about these changes in fairness to us all.

As we have written some time previous to Senators KENDRICK and CAREY and Representative CARTER, from Wyoming on the subject, if you feel so inclined, suggest a copy of this letter be sent them for their information.

Thanking you in advance for your interest, we are,

Very truly yours,

BOULDER CITY COMMERCIAL ASSOCIATION,
By BILL HARRISON, President.

To show the unfairness of what is going on at Boulder City, and the intimidation of the labor employed, I wish especially to quote two paragraphs from the foregoing letter, as follows:

A point we feel necessary to express at this time is that the paramount purpose of Six Companies is to build the Hoover Dam. Their profits should come from this source. Their policy, the exploitation of their subsidiary company, the Boulder City Co., with the advantages of having control of the pay roll, and of the issuance of scrip, redeemable only at company-owned and controlled counters, is manifestly unfair, and must be regulated and restricted with a firm hand, for we do not believe that the Government intended, in entering into a contract for the construction of Hoover Dam, that the clause providing for the commissary should be so elastic and so broad as to reach the size of the present institution they now operate.

* * * * * * *

A matter of great importance which was called to the attention of Doctor Mead, and has on various occasions been brought to the attention of Mr. Ely, is that of intimidation both of employees and sources of supply of merchandise. Intimidation of employees is a difficult matter to prove except at the expense of some man's job. Intimidation of purveyors of merchandise into refusing to do business with the independents has been practiced in various instances, of which we have unqualified proof. This we know you will agree is unfair practice.

Expressing the opposition of the American Federation of Labor to the issuance of scrip redeemable for merchandise at par only at the company stores is exploitation of the most reprehensible character, William Green, its president, wrote me under date of October 3, 1932, and I submit his letter for the record.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 3, 1932.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Reno, Nev.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am amazed at the statement made by Doctor Mead, Commissioner of Reclamation, that the payment of wages in scrip not transferable and redeemable only in merchandise at company stores is a common practice in construction operations throughout the country. Such a practice is most reprehensible and unjust. It is a form of exploitation which ought to be condemned by all just-minded people. The miners fought against this practice in the bituminous-mining regions in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and elsewhere. Payment in scrip redeemable only in merchandise at company stores means coercion of a most vicious kind, exploitation of a most reprehensible character, and a reduction in wages which is unjust and unfair.

Labor is opposed to such a practice and joins heartily with you in the efforts you are putting forth to stop it. We will gladly cooperate with you when you present your resolution dealing with this wicked practice at the short session of Congress.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

The practice of the Six Companies (Inc.) in issuing scrip redeemable at face value in merchandise only at its own store not only leads to an insidious intimidation of the men in its employ but constitutes wage "sweating" of a most pernicious and unfair character. Men who go to Boulder City and are put to work between pay rolls have almost immediate need for cash to send to their families who are in need. When scrip is paid them at the end of the week the workers are compelled to peddle it in Boulder City or Las Vegas for what it will bring, usually from 75 to 80 cents on the dollar. This results in a reduction of from 20 to 25 per cent in the payment of wages which can be construed only as "sweating" labor.

The aggregate amount of scrip paper and coin paid out by the Six Companies (Inc.) in a month is reported to be about $40,000, as the records of the Commissioner of Reclamation will show, so that this "sweating" process and intimidation is conducted on a grand scale. For the Government to stand idly by and permit these unfair practices to go on is a national evil which will result in a serious public reaction when the facts are known. These conditions demand immediate investigation by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of the Senate, provided for in the resolution which I have introduced.

In a bill of complaint in equity filed in the District Court for Nevada December 22, 1932, the Boulder City Co., a subsidiary of the Six Companies (Inc), the private contractor, asked for an injunction to prevent the tax assessor of Clark County, Nev., from assessing its property and collecting the tax. Notwithstanding the fact that the Boulder City Co. runs the department store, which is a great mercantile monopoly, for the Six Companies (Inc.) and should on this private business return taxes to Clark County and the State of Nevada, it filed a bill of complaint in the district court to be relieved from the payment of these taxes. No clearer case of private business than that operated by the Boulder City Co. could be found.

While the Attorney General and the Reclamation Service filed amicus curiæ briefs in the former case against the State mine inspector, neither of these Federal agencies filed briefs or participated in the Boulder City Co. case. The bill of complaint is based upon the action of the Secretary of the Interior in attempting without adequate constitutional and legal authority to create an exclusive jurisdiction Federal reservation. Evidently the Boulder City Co. was willing to rest its case on this premise, which was the principal one presented by the district court in the case of the Six Companies (Inc.) against A. J. Stinson, State mine inspector.

The complaint of the Boulder City Co. not only asked for relief from the payment of taxes to Clark County on its own account but also included all other "persons, firms, or corporations owning personal property" within the so-called Boulder Canyon project Federal reservation. A temporary order restraining the assessor of Clark County from assessing and collecting taxes on the property of the Boulder City Co. and all persons, firms, or corporations owning personal property within the reservation, was filed on December 22, 1932. This action unjustly deprives Clark County and the State of Nevada from taxes on persons, firms, and corporations doing private business at Boulder City, to which they are legally entitled and should have, in order to help meet the extraordinarily heavy burden of additional expense to which they have been put because of the influx of large numbers of workers and their families to build the dam.

Previously I have set forth in detail these numerous additional expenses of Clark County and it is not necessary to repeat them here. Suffice it to say that in the aggregate up to August 29, 1932, these additional expenses amounted to $241,522, an increase in the tax rate of Clark County of 31.5 per cent over and above its constitutional limit.

These serious conditions can not continue without irreparable damage to Clark County and the State of Nevada and they should be investigated immediately and the necessary remedies adopted. The enactment of S. 2885, which I introduced and which is now before the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to conserve the taxing power of Clark County and the State of Nevada in the so-called Boulder Canyon Project Federal Reservation, would afford complete relief from a continuation of these tax payment evasions.

COLLECTS BUT DOES NOT REMIT POLL TAX

The Six Companies (Inc.), the private contractor, ever since the work began at Hoover Dam has been deducting a poll tax from the wages of every worker on the pay roll. Until February, 1932, an official receipt was given for the payment of this tax, but since about that time a special receipt supplied by the company without the authority of the tax authorities of the State or county has been issued the worker.

The tax assessor of Clark County, F. C. DeVinney, reports to me that the Six Companies (Inc.) issued in 1931 2,856 official Clark County receipts making a total of $8,568; in 1932, 2,774 official receipts were issued by the company making a total of $8,322; and since about February the company has issued approximately 5,907 poll-tax receipts of its own making and without official authority totaling $17,721. The Six Companies (Inc.) has impounded in its treasury since the commencement of construction work in 1931 a total of about $34,611.

None of the money collected from the wages of the workers by the Six Companies (Inc.) has been paid to the County of Clark and the State of Nevada. Without any legal authority these poll taxes have been collected and impounded by the Six Companies (Inc.). I submit for the RECORD a telegram from F. C. DeVinney, assessor of Clark County, Nev., under date of February 1, 1933, setting forth the facts concerning these poll-tax collections:

The Six Companies (Inc.) issued 2,856 official Clark County, Nev., receipts for the year 1931 at $3 each, which makes a total of $8,568, which money is impounded by the Six Companies (Inc.) and has not been paid to Clark County, Nev. Six Companies (Inc.) also issued 2,774 official Clark County, Nev., receipts for the year 1932 at $3 each, making a total of $8,322, which money is impounded by the Six Companies (Inc.) and has not been paid to Clark County, Nev.

Since about February, 1932, the Six Companies (Inc.), without any authorization or permission from Clark County officials, have been collecting $3 poll tax from their employees and giving to them a receipt of their own make and issue and not giving to them official receipts of Clark County, Nev. Six Companies (Inc.) has issued approximately 5,907 poll-tax receipts of their own make covering $17,721 deductions made from the wages of their employees since February, 1932. This money is impounded by the Six Companies (Inc.) and has not been paid to Clark County, Nev.

In a telegram from F. C. DeVinney, dated February 1, 1933, the receipt which is now being given for the poll-tax payment without any official authority is described as follows:

This is a copy of receipt given to employees by Six Companies (Inc.) after $3 has been deducted from their wages for poll tax: "Name of employee and identification number. This is to advise you that Six Companies (Inc.) has withheld from your salary the amount of poll tax which the State of Nevada claims is payable to it by you. Six Companies (Inc.) will hold this amount of poll tax for your account until a final determination of the question of whether or not the State of Nevada has authority to levy this poll tax upon you. In the event it should be determined that the State of Nevada has no right to collect said tax, the amount so withheld will be paid by Six Companies (Inc.) to you, but in the event it should be determined that said tax is due the State of Nevada the amount withheld will be used by Six Companies (Inc.) for the payment of said tax. In withholding said tax, Six Companies (Inc.) is not in any way acting for the State of Nevada, or as the agent or other representative of Clark County, Nev., or the assessor of Clark County, Nev. Boulder City, Nev. Date. Six Companies (Inc.), by (officer). Poll tax for the year issued. Receipt number."

The above form receipt is given without any authority or permission from Clark County, Nev.

Before the tax case now before the district court is finally adjudicated in the Supreme Court many years probably will have passed and the poll-tax collections by the Six Companies (Inc.) and impounded by them probably will have grown to many times the $34,000 to which it amounts at present. Many of the workers leave the company's employ, and yet this $3 poll tax is deducted from their wages. Other workers have met with fatal or nonfatal accidents and have been severed from the pay roll after short periods of employment. The labor turnover is very heavy and this results in greatly increasing the number of poll-tax collections and correspondingly increasing the amount of money impounded by the company.

While the Six Companies (Inc.), in its unauthorized receipt now being given the worker for his poll-tax payment, promises to return the amount in the event that the final decision of the tax question by the courts is in favor of the company, it will be practically impossible to make the return of this money to workers whose location many years hence will not be known and to the estates of those who have met with fatal accidents. It is obvious that the company's treasury will benefit to a large extent by failure to make such returns, as the workers, the majority of whom are ex-service men, are from practically every State in the Union.

This unauthorized collection of the poll tax by the Six Companies (Inc.) is indefensible and the most high-handed method of "sweating" the wages of labor that has come to my attention. To think that such a practice should be permitted on a Federal enterprise of first magnitude is particularly obnoxious to those who believe in and support the American policy of fair play and justice.

This condition is so serious that it demands immediate investigation with a view to bringing about a discontinuance of this unjust practice at the earliest moment. A company which will indulge in such unfair practices without obtaining the authority of the officials of the State charged with the responsibility of collecting poll taxes is indeed subject to question as to all of its policies.

INVESTIGATION DEMANDED

The complaints which have been made of the company's business conduct to which I have referred are more than justified and demand immediate investigation as provided for in Senate Resolution 293, now before the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and which I now submit for the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Resolution 293

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate conditions existing in the Boulder Canyon Project Federal Reservation and the operations of the Six Companies (Inc.) and the officers of the Department of the Interior, with respect to the construction of Hoover Dam, and particularly with a view to ascertaining all facts relating to (1) the store operated by the Six Companies (Inc.), (2) contracts for the housing and feeding of employees of the Federal Government and the Six Companies (Inc.), and (3) the taxation of property and incomes within such reservation. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary remedial legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-second Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

In order to expedite consideration of Senate Resolution 293, I wrote to Senator JOHN THOMAS, chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, on December 30, 1932, and herewith submit for the RECORD this letter, together with Senator THOMAS's reply of January 7, 1933.

DECEMBER 30, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: For the purpose of authorizing the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation or any subcommittee thereof to investigate conditions in the Boulder Canyon Project Federal Reservation on December 7, 1932, I introduced Senate Resolution 293, copy of which I herewith inclose.

Before this resolution can be considered by the Senate it will be necessary for it to be referred also to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and I therefore will appreciate any action which you may take to expedite a favorable report by your committee.

Very sincerely yours,

TASKER L. ODDIE.

JANUARY 7, 1933.

DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: I have your letter relative to the Boulder Canyon project investigation and wish to advise that some members of the company have asked to be heard before Senate Resolution 293 is finally passed.

As the time is so short now, I am wondering if it is worth while to go ahead and hold hearings in the matter.

Yours very truly,

JNO. THOMAS.

In the letter from Senator THOMAS I want particularly to call attention to the statement "and wish to advise that some members of the company have asked to be heard before Senate Resolution 293 is finally passed." The resolution referred to provides for an investigation of the officers of the Six Companies (Inc.), the private contractor, and officers of the Interior Department with respect to the serious conditions which I have just presented to the Senate. It would be quite contrary to the general policy of the Senate to permit the company whose conduct is subject to question to appear before a committee on a resolution providing for its investigation. If this were the custom and practice of the Senate none of the extremely necessary investigations would have taken place, as the adoption of resolutions providing for these investigations would have been obstructed by the parties to be investigated.

If and when the resolution I have introduced is adopted and the investigation begun the officers of the Six Companies (Inc.) and the officers of the Interior Department will be given full opportunity to come before the investigating committee—in fact, they will be subpœnaed to appear before the committee.

Every Member of the Senate, which, of course, includes the members of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, who has heard my statement of the serious conditions at Hoover Dam would certainly favor, if not demand, that a thorough investigation be made, and would unanimously join in adopting Senate Resolution 293, the resolution which I have introduced providing for the investigation.

The Secretary of the Interior on November 23, 1931, requested the assistance of the Attorney General in the case of the Six Companies (Inc.) against A. J. Stinson, State mine inspector of Nevada. Attorney General Mitchell in his letter to me of January 26, 1933, previously placed in the RECORD, states that in reply he advised the Secretary of the Interior that the United States Attorney would be directed to render all possible assistance to the contractors in this case. The intervention of the Secretary of the Interior was, therefore, accountable for uniting the executive and judicial branches of the Government in support of the efforts of a private corporation in its attempt to undermine and destroy the sovereignty of the State of Nevada and to deprive the county of Clark and the State of tax revenues to which they are justly entitled. This leaves the State of Nevada almost entirely dependent upon the legislative branch of the Government for relief and the Senate will be performing its important fundamental function in the American plan of government in conducting this investigation and in recommending the necessary remedial action to remove these serious conditions.

Since I have presented to the Senate some of the most important complaints of the conduct of the work at Hoover Dam, hearings before the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation should be unnecessary, and I request that Senate Resolution 293 be promptly reported by that committee. The amount specified in the resolution of $5,000 is nominal, and I request the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report the resolution promptly so that it may be adopted and the investigation begun without delay. Even though the time to the end of this session is short, ample opportunity is left for the investigation.

I am also hopeful that when the committee of investigation studies the facts herein set forth and obtains additional information in the course of the investigation, that a favorable report will be made by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation on S. 2885, which I introduced for the purpose of conserving the taxing power of the county of Clark and the State of Nevada. With such a favorable report it would still be possible to have this bill enacted in this session.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION—REPEAL OF PROHIBITION

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. BLAINE's motion that the Senate proceed to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 211) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ashurst | Cutting | Kendrick | Sheppard |
| Austin | Dale | Keyes | Shipstead |
| Bailey | Davis | King | Shortridge |
| Bankhead | Dickinson | La Follette | Smith |
| Barbour | Dill | Lewis | Smoot |
| Barkley | Fess | Logan | Steiwer |
| Bingham | Fletcher | McGill | Stephens |
| Black | Frazier | McKellar | Swanson |
| Blaine | George | McNary | Thomas, Idaho |
| Borah | Glass | Moses | Thomas, Okla. |
| Bratton | Glenn | Neely | Townsend |

| Clark | Hayden | Reed | Walsh, Mont. |
| Connally | Hebert | Robinson, Ark. | Watson |
| Coolidge | Hull | Robinson, Ind. | White |
| Costigan | Johnson | Russell | |
| Couzens | Kean | Schuyler | |

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. I understand if he were present he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on account of official business of the Senate. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]. If present, my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] would vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Therefore I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I understand if he were present he would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] has a pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER. On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay." I understand the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] would vote "yea."

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is absent because of the death of his father. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senators from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD and Mr. LONG] are necessarily absent. If present, they would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—58

So Mr. BLAINE's motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 211) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

"SEC. 4. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to submit the following amendment and ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 2, strike out the words "the legislatures of" and insert the words "conventions in," and on page 3, line 16, strike out the words "the legislatures of" and insert the words "conventions in."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I submit another amendment and ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas offers the following amendment:

That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States.

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission thereof to the States by the Congress."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment and ask that it may be read and printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield for that purpose?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, at the end of line 13, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words:

And/or to employ such other methods deemed necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the resolution in explanation of the action of the committee, but before doing so I first want to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that no Senator shall speak upon Senate Joint Resolution 211, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States or any amendment thereto or any motion relating to any amendment or to the joint resolution itself more than once or for longer than 20 minutes on the joint resolution or longer than 15 minutes on any amendment or any motion in relation thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I have had to sit in this Chamber and listen to arguments of the Senator from Wisconsin on this question for hours, and I shall have to object to his request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I advised the Senator from Iowa yesterday, I have scarcely consumed any time debating the prohibition question while I have been a Member of the Senate. I want to say, Mr. President, that it is my desire to continue the consideration of this joint resolution until we can obtain a vote on it sometime to-day. I am reliably informed, or at least I have been informed by a great many Members of the Senate, that we can obtain a vote upon the resolution within a reasonable time, and so I hope the Senate will retain a quorum and remain in session until we can obtain a final vote on the resolution and dispose of it.

Mr. President, speaking in behalf of the report of the committee I shall be very brief. The committee in submitting this joint resolution——

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, before the Senator begins will he not——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will not the Senator suggest a unanimous-consent agreement limiting the debate on the part of each Senator to one hour? Perhaps such a request might be granted.

Mr. BLAINE. I think perhaps, Mr. President, that that would be too long a time.

Mr. President, the question before us has had the consideration of the two major political parties. At their national conventions last year they resolved very emphatically upon the question of amending the eighteenth amendment. The Republican Party, referring to an amendment to the eighteenth amendment, resolved:

Such an amendment should be promptly submitted to the States by Congress, to be acted upon by State conventions called for that sole purpose.

The Republican platform asked for a prompt submission of the question.

The Democratic Party in convention assembled resolved—I will read just a brief portion of their platform declaration:

We advocate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. To effect such repeal we demand that the Congress immediately propose a constitutional amendment to truly representative conventions in the States called to act solely on that proposal.

I read these two party declarations for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that both the great political parties resolved for immediate action upon this question. Moreover, Mr. President, I think——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has just read the two clauses in the political platforms of the Democratic and the Republican Parties which call for the submission of a proposed constitutional amendment for ratification by conventions. I wish to point out to him now that an amendment is pending designed to make the joint resolution conform to the platforms of both parties, and I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, who has worked so long and diligently on the pending joint resolution, why it was that the committee reporting it disregarded the declaration of both political parties in favor of ratification by conventions?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, during the course of my brief remarks I will undertake to set forth the committee's position on that question. I read a portion of the two platforms merely for the purpose of pointing out that both political parties resolved for immediate action upon repeal. That was the only purpose I had.

Each of the two parties took perhaps a different attitude respecting the substance of an amendment providing for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, but before proceeding to discuss that proposition I come now to answer the question submitted by the Senator from Arkansas.

I think I accurately state the opinion of the committee when I point out that it must be perfectly obvious to those of us at least who have attended national conventions or any political party conventions that resolutions are adopted the purpose of which is to set forth the party's stand upon certain fundamental questions; and the fundamental question involved in this issue is whether or not the eighteenth amendment shall be repealed. The question of the mode of repeal is not the essence of the question at all; it merely goes to the method by which the Congress may submit the question for ratification; and in the consideration of that proposition the committee felt that consideration was not given by the conventions primarily to the question of the mode of repeal but rather to the substantive elimination of the eighteenth amendment from the Constitution.

Moreover, it must be obvious to everyone that the conventions, either in the committee on resolutions or on the convention floor, gave practically no consideration to the problem of the expenditures involved in case the convention method was chosen as the mode of ratification. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have been struggling along during all the present session and during a great portion of the last session of the Congress endeavoring to save a few dollars here and a few dollars there, a few hundred dollars or a few thousand dollars and as many million dollars as we could save in public expenditures in order to balance the Budget. Now we must face the fact that the convention system is going to be an expensive method for ratification. Take, for instance, in a so-called wet State where it is obvious that the legislature would immediately upon the presentation to it for ratification of the proposed constitutional amendment adopt a resolution to ratify the amendment. There is no necessity, in my opinion, to put those States to the expense of holding a convention.

The holding of a convention means a campaign. It means first, however, that the legislature must provide for holding an election at which delegates would be elected to attend the convention to pass upon the proposed constitutional amendment. That means a preliminary campaign in which both sides, no doubt, would participate, during which campaign enormous sums of money would necessarily be expended because of the particular character of this question and the zeal that is exhibited on the wet side and the dry side alike.

Then would come the holding of an election to select delegates in every precinct of the United States, or in those States that would provide for a convention and would set up the legal machinery for the purpose of holding it. There would be enormous expense in the conduct of that election. I presume for my own State that the expenditure would run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. So as the committee viewed the proposition they thought the States ought not to be compelled to expend those enormous sums of money, when we have a constitutional and an available system for ratification of any proposed constitutional amendment.

Moreover, the committee took the view that a legislature which would authorize the holding of a convention and provide machinery by which the delegates were to be elected and a convention held would in all probability ratify the amendment.

Furthermore, it was the view of the committee that this question has been thoroughly discussed throughout the country. In every hamlet and every city it has been so thoroughly discussed that I doubt if at the election held in 1932 there was a single polling place in the United States where the prohibition question was not injected respecting the election of members to the respective legislatures.

It has been suggested—and the suggestion was discussed by the subcommittee and also by the whole committee—that the Federal Government might pay the cost of holding an election for the purpose of electing delegates to the conventions in the respective States. I think it was the consensus of opinion of the committee that there was no constitutional authority for the Federal Government to set up machinery generally throughout the United States for the conduct of this election. However that may be, it must be obvious to everyone that because of certain factors that enter in, the Congress of the United States in all probability never would set up that machinery, even though the Congress may have the power.

Those are the considerations that were weighed by the committee; and due to those considerations the committee came to the conclusion that ratification by the legislatures would mean saving all of the expenditure and all of the turmoil and all of the disorganization that necessarily would take place in a campaign between the wets and the drys, and struggles to elect delegates to the respective conventions, all of which ought to be avoided in these times, if possible. So, since the legislatures in about 41 or 42 States, as I recall, are in session now, and all of them will be in session until after the 4th of March, it is my opinion that if a joint resolution were passed by this Congress providing for ratification by State legislatures, from the practical standpoint of one who does not believe in the eighteenth amendment, we would be assured of an earlier repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

So much on that proposition, Mr. President. Then we come to the next controversial question.

Section 1 is a straight, outright repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Section 1, if it is incorporated in the joint resolution, submitted by the Congress, and ratified by the necessary States, will entirely eliminate the eighteenth amendment from the Constitution. I need not discuss that section.

Then we have suggested and offered section 2, which provides as follows:

> The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors in violation of the laws thereof is hereby prohibited.

Mr. President, in agreeing to that section I think the committee was unanimous that the language used would effectuate the purpose that is obviously designed by section 2. It is claimed, however, and I think with some degree of assurance for the future, that Congress now has the power to pass laws to protect the so-called dry States in regulation of interstate commerce over intoxicating liquors. A great many laws on that subject have been enacted.

I will not review those laws in detail. First, however, we had what is known as the Wilson law. That law was treated in the case of Rhodes v. Iowa (170 U. S. 412); but the Supreme Court in that case gave rather a restricted construction of the language used by the Congress, and held that under the Wilson Act the interstate character attached to the liquor until it had actually been delivered to the consignee. In other words, the court held that the interstate-commerce clause—that is, the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce—attached to that commodity not only before it entered the State but after it entered the State so long as it was in process of transportation either by rail, by express, or by any other method, until the commodity or the intoxicating liquor was in fact delivered to the consignee.

Then came an amendment to the Wilson Act, known as the Webb-Kenyon Act. The Webb-Kenyon Act was interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Railway Co. (242 U. S. 311). The language of the Webb-Kenyon Act was designed to give the State in effect power of regulation over intoxicating liquor from the time it actually entered the confines of the State; and the Supreme Court held that it was following the doctrine laid down in the case of Rhodes against Iowa, and necessarily must follow that doctrine in order to sustain the decision it was making in the case of Clark against Maryland Railway Co.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I see my able friend from New York shaking his head. I yield to him.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not want to enter into a controversy, because it really is not very important, but I do not think the Senator meant to say that by this act Congress delegated to the States the power to regulate interstate commerce; Congress itself regulated interstate commerce to the point of removing all immunities of liquor in interstate commerce.

Mr. BLAINE. I thank the Senator. I think he has given the correct statement of the doctrine. My understanding of the question was identically the same—that it was the action of the Congress of the United States in regulating intoxicating liquor that protected the dry State within the terms of the law passed by the Congress.

Then, following the Webb-Kenyon Act, was the Reed "bone dry" amendment. That went somewhat further. I need not discuss that. That amendment was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Hill (248 U. S. 420).

In the case of Clark against Maryland Railway Co. there was a divided opinion. There has been a divided opinion in respect to the earlier cases, and that division of opinion seems to have come down to a very late day. So, to assure the so-called dry States against the importation of intoxicating liquor into those States, it is proposed to write permanently into the Constitution a prohibition along that line.

Mr. President, the pending proposal will give the States that guarantee. When our Government was organized and the Constitution of the United States adopted, the States surrendered control over and regulation of interstate commerce. This proposal is restoring to the States, in effect, the right to regulate commerce respecting a single commodity—namely, intoxicating liquor. In other words, the State is not surrendering any power that it possesses, but rather, by reason of this provision, in effect acquires powers that it has not at this time.

The committee felt that since the Congress had acted and had definitely legislated upon this question, while that legislation had been sustained by the Supreme Court, yet it was sustained by a divided court, and that we could well afford to guarantee to the so-called dry States the protection designed by section 2.

I am opposed to the dry States interfering with the so-called wet States in connection with this question of intoxicating liquors; and so, by the same token, I am willing to grant to the dry States full measure of protection, and thus prohibit the wet States from interfering in their internal affairs respecting the control of intoxicating liquors.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have set forth briefly, perhaps inadequately, the view of the committee as expressed in this joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I notice that the Senator keeps using the phrase, "The view of the committee." Has the Senator a different personal view from the committee?

Mr. BLAINE. I have not on that proposition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator on any of the propositions connected with this matter?

Mr. BLAINE. I have. I will come to the next proposition presently.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Therefore the Senator, at some stage in his speech, is going to distinguish between the committee's views and his own views?

Mr. BLAINE. I am.

Mr. President, when I say that I am expressing the views of the committee I am doing so because I have been directed by the committee to report this joint resolution, and I am endeavoring to express what I believe to be the view of the committee as a constituent part of the Senate of the United States and not expressing the individual views of the members of the committee. I want that distinctly understood. I do not speak for the individual members of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Were there record votes in the committee on these various propositions?

Mr. BLAINE. There were.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator put them in the RECORD at this juncture?

Mr. BLAINE. I think I have them. Let me finish the third proposition and then I will put them in the RECORD, if I have the record.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All votes of the committee on the various aspects of this proposal.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall.

Now coming to the third section, it reads as follows:

> Congress shall have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

The committee, in considering that proposition, in my opinion, indulges in language that will effectuate the purpose designed. The purpose designed by that section is to give Congress the power to prevent the restoration of the saloon.

As I say, I am not expressing the viewpoint of individual Members of the Senate, nor am I expressing my viewpoint. I am endeavoring to express the viewpoint of the committee as a committee, rather than individual viewpoints. I apologize for repeating that statement; but I want to call attention to the party platforms on this proposition, which the committee had before it, and which the committee had a right to consider, and did consider.

The Republican platform on this particular question resolved as follows—I will read only the paragraph that has particular reference to the saloon:

> We, therefore, believe that the people should have an opportunity to pass upon a proposed amendment the provision of which, while retaining in the Federal Government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, but subject always to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition may exist and safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and attendant abuses.

Mr. President, that section, of course, carries into effect the purposes or designs of the resolution.

Now, turning to the Democratic platform upon the same subject, reading only that which has reference to this question, I find the following:

> We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the States.

The difference between the Republican platform and the Democratic platform on this question of preventing the return of the saloon is merely a question of procedure. They both propose to prevent the return of the saloon. There is no question about that. The Republican platform proposes to do it by leaving in Congress some power, if you please, because after the eighteenth amendment is repealed the Congress will have no police powers respecting this question of intoxicating liquors. So, as I view it, the Republican platform proposes to repose the power not only in the States, but also in the Congress, to prevent the return of the saloon, and to regulate the alleged abuses and evils in reference thereto.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I could not quite comprehend what the Senator meant when he said "some power." When we analyze the provision in detail is it not a fact that we find that it confers all power? In the analysis I hope to make as to the legal phase of the matter, I think I can show that it confers almost all the power that now exists as a result of the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. There is very little difference.

Mr. BLAINE. I submit that the Senator's statement is correct in so far as that power relates to intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold. That obviously means the saloon, does it not? That is, it means a public drinking place; it may be a saloon, it may be a hotel, it may be a restaurant. I am not undertaking to analyze the minds of those who adopted the platform. I am just trying to make this point, that the Republican platform proposes to prevent the return of the saloon by retaining in Congress power which it now has under the eighteenth amendment on that question, and that single question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is not the difference between the two party platforms in substance this, That the Democratic Party platform declares for the States and the States alone determining the manner in which intoxicating liquors shall be manufactured, sold, and distributed, while the Republican Party platform holds to control over the method of sale in part by the Federal Government and in part by the State governments?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not understand that I am endeavoring to defend either platform on that question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is not that the distinction?

Mr. BLAINE. I am simply endeavoring to present that which the committee took under consideration when it drafted the particular language I am discussing. I am, in a way, a referee in this matter. I did not support either the Republican platform or the Democratic platform. I have no partisan viewpoint in the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This clause which the committee reports supports the Republican platform and not the Democratic platform.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not yet approached an analysis of the Democratic platform on this subject, as the committee views it, and given my opinion of it, though I want to do that. I think it is only fair I should do that before I conclude.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator does not want to make his concluding statement at this time?

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no.

Mr. WAGNER and Mr. FESS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to get into a controversy as between Democrats and Republicans. I am quite indifferent as to what their attitude was on the question.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I have not thus far, nor will I, discuss with the Senator any political considerations. I am concerned with the legal effect of the proposal the Senator is now discussing.

I understood the Senator to say specifically that section 3 limits the power of Congress to deal with a specific subject. But I am sure the Senator has followed the history of the legislation in relation to the eighteenth amendment and knows that Congress, according to the interpretation or sanction by the United States Supreme Court is permitted to deal with subjects which do not relate exactly to the powers or go beyond the powers specifically delegated by the Constitution, and permit the adoption of measures which have for their purpose hedging in the particular powers, so that they may be more effectively enforced.

If I may state a specific case——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I think the Senator is perfectly clear on that. I agree with him as to his abstract proposition.

Mr. WAGNER. I wanted to give a concrete example, to show just what I mean. It will take only a second.

The eighteenth amendment authorized Congress to deal only with intoxicants to be used for beverage purposes, and everyone assumed, of course, that that was a limitation upon Congress to deal only with intoxicants to be used for beverage purposes. But in order to carry out the power thus delegated, Congress dealt with liquor used for medical purposes, and in one instance absolutely prohibited the use of malt liquor for medical purposes, although specifically no such power was given Congress; and that was upheld by the courts.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, there is no disagreement between the Senator and myself upon the application of that general principle. Our difference is this: Under the eighteenth amendment Congress was given power over the subject of intoxicating liquors, without any restrictions whatever. The grant embraced all power, power over transportation, importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. There is no doubt about that. Under section 3 the subject is intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold. I doubt very much whether the general principle set down by the very able lawyer, counselor, and Senator from New York is applicable to the broad extent to which he would undertake to apply that principle.

However that may be, it was the view of the committee that section 3 related only to the question of the saloon, that is, the public drinking place; that the Federal Government would have concurrent power with the States to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold. That was the conclusion and opinion of the committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Section 3 is the one section about which I am concerned, and it is to that section that I offered an amendment a while ago.

Conceding that there is a desire to avoid a return of the old drinking place—and everybody seems to want to do that—I thought we could not go further than to legislate so as to forbid the product being drunk where it is sold, on the premises. As far as it goes, that seems to me one of the effective methods proposed to prevent the return of the saloon, if that can be prevented. But, in the discussion of this matter for months before the conventions met, a lot of methods were proposed. One was that the object might be accomplished by a State or National dispensary system, if that were thought wise. Others thought that it might be arrived at by a system of licensing. Others thought it might be accomplished through the exercise of the taxing power.

I wondered whether the Senator would not agree to broaden the authority, so that Congress would not be limited to just this one thing, forbidding the drinking of the product where it is bought, but might be willing to extend broad power so that whatever might be necessary to prevent the return of the saloon Congress would have the authority to enact, if we thought it was wise. The amendment I offered was designed to broaden this authority.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as the Senator in charge of the joint resolution, I have no authority to modify the amendment proposed by the committee, and I want to state that the committee, in drafting the resolution, undertook to employ language sufficiently broad to do that which was obviously designed to be done, and the committee thought that section 3 would give Congress power over intoxicating liquors drunk on the premises where sold, and that it would give such implied powers as are necessary in such premises.

For instance, under this power, Congress could pass a law divorcing the sale of hard liquor, spirituous liquor, from the sale of malt and vinous liquors, or divorcing the sale of hard liquors from the sale of milder liquors; that is, providing that hard liquor should not be drunk on the premises where sold, and permitting wine and beer to be drunk on the premises where sold, for instance, at a hotel, at a restaurant, in a public garden, or, for that matter, in any public place. The Congress would have the power to pass legislation respecting that question generally.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I voted against taking up the joint resolution, and the Senator might infer that I am opposed to anything being done. I voted against it simply because I thought this was not the time to act. But if we could get the broad power in section 3 to do what the Senator admits we all want to do, I should vote for the resolution when we come to a vote. But if all power is denied, of course I shall vote against it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In aid of the thought expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin, and answering some suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, I would like to have appear in the RECORD the last subdivision, subdivision 18, of section 8, of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, which reads:

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

So that, without going into detail, here is a conferring power to make any law necessary to carry into effect the foregoing or any other power.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I was proceeding along the line of endeavoring to point out the attitude of the committee. I have endeavored to point out how the committee was attempting to meet the situation as the political parties had resolved.

Under section 3, in the absence of any Federal law respecting liquor that is to be drunk on the premises where sold, every State, of course, could legislate upon that question, and that legislation would be supreme. If the Congress of the United States legislated upon that question, yet the States would have, of course, power to legislate along the same lines.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Which would be supreme?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to get into a discussion of that matter. That is a field in which we can get into all kinds of misunderstanding.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Suppose there is a conflict between the Federal law and the State law, what happens, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. BLAINE. In my opinion, the Federal law would prevail, of course, as it does under the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. So the word "concurrent" is meaningless?

Mr. BLAINE. That was to assure that there would be power in the States and power in the Congress. That is the only purpose in using the words "concurrent power." I doubt if it is necessary language, but the committee thought it was. I appreciate the Senator's technical position on the matter. I think it has all been discussed and very well threshed out by the Supreme Court in the national prohibition cases and in other cases interpreting the eighteenth amendment. It is unnecessary, of course, to discuss that question in connection with this matter. It is admitted that the Congress would have the power to legislate, to prohibit, to regulate liquor to be drunk on the premises where sold. The States would have that power, of course.

Mr. President, the Democratic Party resolved to carry out the intent of section 3 of the committee report. It said:

> We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the States.

There is no difference as between the two political platforms as to the purpose they designed to accomplish. The only difference is in the method of accomplishment. The Republican platform demands reservation in the Congress, the Democratic platform proposing to do the same thing solely through State legislatures.

I submit, without intending to be controversial, that I know of no way by which the Congress of the United States could carry out the design of either party except by giving the Congress some power in the premises. Certainly the Congress will have no power over the legislatures in the absence of this authority to tell the legislatures of the several States that they must enact laws to outlaw the saloon. Therefore it was the view of the committee that section 3 would carry out the designed purpose of the declarations of the two political parties.

Mr. President, I do not agree with either of the parties upon that proposition.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I was unable to comprehend the Senator's statement when he said the Democratic platform could not be carried out without lodging some power in Congress to deal with the liquor question.

Mr. BLAINE. I said it could not be carried out through the Congress unless some power was lodged in the Congress. The Democratic proposal could be carried out only by the respective States.

Mr. WAGNER. That is true.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, my own personal viewpoint upon section 3 is that it is contrary to section 2 of the resolution. I am now endeavoring to give my personal views. The purpose of section 2 is to restore to the States by constitutional amendment absolute control in effect over interstate commerce affecting intoxicating liquors which enter the confines of the States. The State under section 2 may enact certain laws on intoxicating liquors, and section 2 at once gives such laws effect. Thus the States are granted larger power in effect and are given greater protection, while under section 3 the proposal is to take away from the States the powers that the States would have in the absence of the eighteenth amendment. My view therefore is that section 3 is inconsistent with section 2, and the two sections are incompatible, and that section 3 ought to be taken out of the resolution. I made myself clear before the subcommittee and before the full committee, and made a reservation to that effect.

I have now concluded my remarks so far as they relate to the purpose and design of the committee. I have undertaken to set forth my viewpoint respecting section 3 of the resolution. Now, I want to conclude respecting my own personal viewpoint and attitude upon the whole question.

The eighteenth amendment is an inflexible police regulation which might be appropriate in a municipal ordinance in those sections of our country where the people desire a bone-dry local régime. The eighteenth amendment does not give to the Congress a general grant of power to regulate. It is strictly a prohibition, a mandate. It is specifically a prohibitive provision of the Constitution.

Surely, Mr. President, it was never designed that our Constitution would be a compilation of local ordinances regulating the lives, the customs, and the habits of our people. But that is exactly the character of the eighteenth amendment. It has no place in the Constitution. Its inflexibility was demonstrated in the Congress when it was undertaken to pass a revenue act providing for a tax upon beer. The inflexibility of the eighteenth amendment was emphasized before the subcommittee and the full Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate when it had under consideration that revenue proposal, which had been passed by the House, respecting the question of its constitutionality. I submit, Mr. President, that it took some time, some study, some consideration before the committee could recommend amendments to the proposal in order to bring it within the eighteenth amendment and yet to accomplish the purpose designed by the House of Representatives and as has been resolved upon time and time again by political parties in many of the States of our Union. Therefore, as I said, in my opinion the eighteenth amendment has no place in the Constitution.

Paraphrasing President Lincoln, on saving the Union, it is my paramount object in this struggle to take prohibition out of the Constitution.

If I could take prohibition out of the Constitution by providing for ratification by conventions, I would do it. If I could take prohibition out of the Constitution by providing for ratification by the legislatures, I would do it.

If I could take prohibition out of the Constitution by restricting the power of the Congress respecting the regulation of commerce as to intoxicating liquors, I would do it.

If I could take prohibition out of the Constitution by giving to the Congress the power to regulate or prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold, I would do it.

If I could take prohibition out of the Constitution by taking out or leaving in sections 2 and 3 of the proposed amendment, or either of them, I would do it.

What I do about taking prohibition out of the Constitution, I do because I believe it will help to ratify a repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

What I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it will help to take prohibition out of the Constitution.

I shall do less whenever I shall believe that doing less will help to take prohibition out of the Constitution, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe that doing more will help to take prohibition out of the Constitution.

Therefore I shall vote for an absolute repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the ratification thereof by conventions, if that is the mode of ratification proposed by Congress by which prohibition may be removed from the Constitution. I shall vote for a repeal of the eighteenth amendment, with ratification by the legislatures, if that is the mode of ratification proposed by Congress by which prohibition may be removed from the Constitution.

I shall vote for a repeal of the eighteenth amendment if sections 2 and 3 remain in the proposed amendment. I shall vote for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment if sections 2 and 3, or either of them, are stricken out of the proposed amendment.

My object is to take the eighteenth amendment out of the Constitution.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, some days ago I offered an amendment to the pending joint resolution and had it printed. I now send it forward and offer it to the committee text of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico desire the amendment read?

Mr. BRATTON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 2, it is proposed to strike out the words "the legislatures of" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "conventions in."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a similar amendment has already been offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question. Is the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Mexico similar to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRATTON. I did not know that the Senator from Arkansas had proposed such an amendment but this is the amendment which I offered in the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. At the outset of the discussion this morning the Senator from Arkansas, the leader on this side, offered two amendments which I assume he offered representing the views of the minority, and one of them was similar to the amendment just proposed by the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the amendments proposed by the Senator from Arkansas were not formally offered, but that they were merely presented and read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I merely want to announce that unless I shall change my purpose, it is my intention to offer Senate Joint Resolution 202 as a substitute for the joint resolution submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin, however it may be amended.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in accord with the arguments presented by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], but I hope, perhaps, to amplify them somewhat, particularly as to an analysis of the legal aspect of section 3 of the joint resolution.

Mr. President, the pending joint resolution tendered to the Senate and the country is called a proposal to repeal the eighteenth amendment, and because artfully it employs the word "repeal" in its first section, it pretends to fulfill the wish overwhelmingly expressed by the American people at the last election. But I submit that the pending resolution does not in fact repeal the inherently false philosophy of the eighteenth amendment. It does not correct the central error of national prohibition. It does not restore to the States responsibility for their local liquor problems. It does not withdraw the Federal Government from the field of local police regulation into which it has trespassed. It utterly flouts the will of the majority as registered in the election last November.

Year after year an unremitting battle had been waged, an unending campaign of debate, before we reached the present pass where the Congress of the United States is ready to resubmit the policy of the eighteenth amendment for the approval or rejection of the American people. And now, that we have reached the final phase of the struggle, so far as I am concerned, at least, I do not propose to accept a sham and hollow victory.

I have many times declared and I now repeat that the question which has troubled the American people since the eighteenth amendment was added to the Constitution was not at all concerned with liquor. It was a question of government; how to restore the constitutional balance of power and authority in our Federal system which had been upset by national prohibition. That equilibrium which prior to the eighteenth amendment was one of the functional marvels of our system of government is not restored by the pending resolution. On the contrary, it perpetuates the lack of balance, the absence of symmetry, the confusion and overlapping of Federal and local authority.

Before analyzing the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 211 it is pertinent to examine the platform declarations of the two principal parties with reference to the eighteenth amendment. In order to refresh the recollections of the Members of the Senate I shall read two brief extracts from the Republican and Democratic platforms of 1932.

The Republican platform declared:

> We do not favor a submission limited to the issue of retention or repeal * * *. We, therefore, believe that the people should have an opportunity to pass upon a proposed amendment, the provision of which, while retaining in the Federal Government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow the States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, but subject always to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition may exist and safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and attendant abuses.
> Such an amendment should promptly be submitted to the States by Congress, to be acted upon by State conventions called for that sole purpose in accordance with the provisions of Article V of the Constitution and adequately safeguarded so as to be truly representative.

I shall not dwell on the Republican platform declaration, because, while it is difficult to argue that the pending joint resolution does not conform to the Republican platform, the people overwhelmingly rejected that platform as a sham, a pretense, and a straddle.

The Democratic platform declared:

> We advocate the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. To effect such repeal we demand that Congress immediately propose a constitutional amendment to truly representative conventions in the States called to act solely on that proposal. We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision by the States.

I know quite well that in and out of this Chamber are those who regard platform planks with cynical indifference, who discount their effect on public opinion; but may I recall to you, Mr. President, that these were no ordinary, run-of-the-mill party planks. The attention of the entire country was riveted upon each of the conventions, eagerly awaiting the formulation of its prohibition views. These declarations were thoroughly debated and the proceedings were broadcast through press and radio to the entire country. Throughout the campaign they were minutely discussed by spokesmen of both parties. If there be any who contend that the American people did not thoroughly comprehend the issue so sharply joined on prohibition, they must ascribe to the voters a degree of incompetence which would make of democracy a farce and a byword. I do not hold that view. I credit the American people with full and ripe understanding of the prohibition issue. And upon that issue they expressed their preference by giving an overwhelming victory to the Democratic candidates.

If there be any meaning in representative government—if the people of the United States are in truth sovereign—then the will unequivocally expressed by them ought to prevail in this body.

In substance and form, Senate Joint Resolution 211 is a repudiation of the public demand. Instead of ratification by conventions as promised in both platforms, it proposes ratification by legislatures. This, however, is relatively a minor objection when compared to the nullification of the entire program of repeal which is attempted in section 3 of the resolution. Section 3 provides:

> Congress shall have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

Should this language ever be incorporated into the Constitution, we would inaugurate another experiment, "noble in purpose" but mischievous and destructive in effect. I say "noble in motive," because the apparent intention of the advocates of this resolution is to outlaw the saloon. I am in sympathy with that purpose; but the suggested method of accomplishing it—the proposal that it shall continue to be the responsibility of the Federal Government—is all wrong. It flies in the face of reason and experience. If the Federal Government failed to discharge that responsibility under the all-embracing prohibition of the eighteenth amendment, what folly is it which prompts anyone to believe that it can discharge it under the milder language of the pending resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does the Senator feel he speaks the sentiments of the people of New York when he says he is in sympathy with the proposal to outlaw the saloon?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And does the Senator think that the State of New York will adopt appropriate legislation to that end?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. President, in addition to these general objections to the resolution, I desire to set forth seven specific objections.

First. The inevitable consequence of section 3 will be that the liquor question will continue to bedevil national politics. It is unquestionably true that part of the force back of the movement for repeal was the desire to bring to an end the intrusion of that problem into the national sphere, which had served in many ways to confuse public consideration of truly national problems. Section 3 of the pending resolution perpetuates that condition.

Second. The power of Congress "to regulate or prohibit," which is conferred by section 3, is described as "concurrent power." In other words, we shall have two authorities, Federal and State, simultaneously possessed of jurisdiction over the same area of regulation. The zone which each is to occupy is undefined. It is the kind of provision which unavoidably leads to confusion, conflict, and litigation. Ultimately, of course, the history of "concurrent power" under this new amendment would not differ from that of "concurrent" power under the eighteenth amendment. Instead of "concurrent," the power of Congress will be dominant and absolute over the States. No other result is possible. Two sovereignties in conflict can not both prevail. In this instance, as in every other instance, it will be the national and not the State authority which will be supreme; and that is the ironical result of an amendment designed to restore to the States control of their liquor problem.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer a further interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is entirely familiar with legislation by the States and legislation by municipalities covering the same subject, is he not?

Mr. WAGNER. Covering the same subject?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. I am not familiar with legislation of that type. The State delegates power to a municipality. A municipality, of course, is only a corporation of the State, and thus acts and governs by delegated power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me point the Senator to such an instance. In the State of Montana there is a State law prohibiting the keeping within the limits of any city of more than 100 pounds of explosives at any one time. Some cities think that is not sufficient protection, and they make it a crime to keep more than 50 pounds at any one time within the city limits. Which would the Senator say was predominant?

Mr. WAGNER. The State would be predominant because the authority of the municipality can not exceed that of the State. In prescribing the amount of explosives that might be kept at any one time, such power could not be exercised by the municipality unless it had been delegated by the State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Neither the one nor the other in that case is dominant. If a man has 75 pounds of explosives within the city limits he can not be prosecuted under the State law but he can be prosecuted under the city law. So the two, having concurrent jurisdiction, stand together without any interference at all.

Mr. WAGNER. There is not any concurrent jurisdiction, with all due respect to the Senator, in the case of the States and the Federal Government. The Senator is so great a student of law that I realize I am saying something very trite when I say that the Federal Government acts only upon delegated power, and has only such powers as the States have delegated to it. In the case of the municipality and the State, the municipality acts only upon delegated power; and any power it exercises, such as the Senator has described, is exercised only by the will of the State. Therefore, there can not be the question of concurrent authority.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I simply challenge the statement that the Federal power must be dominant when there is a concurrent power.

Mr. WAGNER. Except that in the case of the eighteenth amendment the United States Supreme Court says it is dominant. That is the difficulty in the situation. That is what I have stated, and it has been so held by the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Supreme Court of the United States has never outlawed a State statute because it was contrary to a Federal statute on prohibition.

Mr. WAGNER. It never has had, in the case of the eighteenth amendment, the question of a State statute where States were given concurrent power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Federal Government could make a certain act or series of acts criminal, and the States could make them likewise criminal, or could make lesser or greater acts criminal.

Mr. WAGNER. That is not acting differently; but if the State acted in conflict with the Federal Government in the matter of legislation in the regulation of intoxicants, as the Supreme Court has stated in the liquor cases, the Federal Government would be dominant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rise merely to say that there are a great many instances in which the Federal Government and the State government exercise concurrent power.

Mr. WAGNER. They remain concurrent so long as they are not in conflict.

Third. The real cause of the failure of the eighteenth amendment was that it attempted to impose a single standard of conduct upon all the people of the United States without regard to local sentiment and local habits. Section 3 of the pending joint resolution proposes to condemn the new amendment to a similar fate of failure and futility. No law can live unless it finds lodgment in the public conscience and is nourished by public support.

True enough, section 3 does not in itself impose a national standard, but it invites Congress to impose it; and to that extent it is an invitation to further nullification, a perpetuation of the conflict between governmental authority and public opinion.

Fourth. In order to exercise the power "to regulate or prohibit" which is conferred by section 3, Congress will have to provide an enforcement agency. But that is not all. Any realistic calculation will reveal that the agency will be larger, more expensive, and more subject to abuse and corruption than the Bureau of Prohibition. The kind of regulation which may be fairly anticipated under section 3 can not possibly be administered except by a genuine police force of thousands upon thousands of officers. The Federal Government has never been equipped with such a force, and it can not be so equipped unless we alter the nature of our Government beyond recognition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WAGNER. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I take it from the Senator's argument that he is of the opinion that it is impossible, as a practical proposition, for the National Government to control the manner of consumption or the place of drinking of this beverage, once it has been legalized or permitted to be sold.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not quite understand the Senator's question.

Mr. BORAH. I say, I take it that the Senator's position is that as a practical proposition the National Government can not enforce any constitutional amendment which undertakes to control the place of consumption or the place where the beverage shall be drunk, once you have repealed the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. That is exactly what my point is.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is what I took it to be.

Mr. WAGNER. And it has not done it so far. It has attempted it under the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, it being contended that it is impossible now to prevent the sale and the consumption of liquor at a particular place, certainly we can not do it after we have legalized its sale.

I am not disposed to differ from the Senator about that proposition; but what I should like to ask the Senator is whether there is any practical way, in his opinion, by which the National Government can prevent the return of the saloon once we have legalized the sale of intoxicating liquors and turned it back to the States.

Mr. WAGNER. Have confidence in your State governments. We have confidence in our State governments to deal with other and much more important subjects. We have confidence in our State governments to administer justice, to provide for the national defense, to provide for the education of their children, to protect their people against crime and criminals. All of these matters are now dealt with effectively and successfully by the State governments; and I say this matter of controlling the habits of people and regulating them is a local affair and in the province of State government, and the only way to deal with it successfully is to leave it to the conscience of the people of each State instead of attempting to set up a uniform standard for all of the people of the United States. Then, in my judgment, we will get laws which are in harmony with the conscience of the people, and which will on that account be supported and enforced.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps I did not put my question as I should have. In other words, the Senator thinks the question of determining whether or not the saloon shall return must be left entirely to the States?

Mr. WAGNER. It must be left to the States; and I believe the overwhelming sentiment in this country is so definite in every State that we will have no return of the saloon. I can say that for the State of New York; but let the people of each State deal with that subject, and they will do it more effectively and more successfully than the Federal Government has done, because it is not the business of the Federal Government.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say that he could speak definitely for the State of New York on that subject. The Senator feels assured that the State of New York will not permit the return of the saloon?

Mr. WAGNER. I believe that to be the fact, because I believe that is the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the State; and that is what controls the enactment and enforcement of law—the enlightened sentiment of the community.

Mr. BORAH. We are advised by the newspapers that there are some 5,000 saloons now in New York City. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; as a result of the effort of the Federal Government to regulate local habits. Leave it to the people of the State of New York, and that matter will be dealt with. The condition described by the Senator from Idaho obtains not only in New York; it is true of the entire country, showing what an utter failure the Federal Government has made in its effort to regulate by a single standard throughout the country the habits of the people.

Mr. BORAH. But the State of New York repealed all its laws which aided the National Government in preventing the return of the saloon.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; it did.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask if the laws of the State of New York were enforced before the repeal of the Gage-Mullan Act? Did you not have saloons in New York in spite of the laws of New York?

Mr. WAGNER. Because the standard of regulation for the liquor traffic was fixed by the Federal Government, and it was not in conformity with the opinion of the people of the State of New York, national prohibition did not enjoy the support of the opinion of the people of the State of New York, and I think since the last election we can say that it is regarded by the people of the United States as an utter failure.

Mr. GLASS. I am not talking about that. What I am asking the Senator is, Whether the State of New York did not have a statute undertaking to regulate the liquor traffic, and whether it did regulate the liquor traffic?

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator speaking of the time before prohibition?

Mr. GLASS. You had the Gage-Mullan Act.

Mr. WAGNER. We had no power to regulate the liquor traffic. All that we could do was to pass laws supplementing the efforts of the Federal prohibition agents to enforce the law.

Mr. GLASS. What I am asking the Senator is, Were those laws effective?

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think they were.

Mr. GLASS. Then why does the Senator think that a law of the State of New York would be effective hereafter in preventing the return of the saloon?

Mr. WAGNER. Because we in New York were not allowed to deal with and regulate that traffic, we were compelled to take the regulations of the Federal Government with reference to the enforcement of the law. That is the reason.

Mr. GLASS. The proposition here is not to regulate; it is to prohibit the return of the saloon.

Mr. WAGNER. I think I have convinced the Senator that it means more than that.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think it even means that. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the galleries.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to discuss the legal effects of section 3.

Fifth. Let no one harbor the hope that the power granted in section 3 will remain unexercised; or the misapprehension that its purpose is but to serve as a threat against the State which departs from the course desired by a majority of Congress. We know perfectly well that the grant of the power "to regulate or prohibit" as defined in section 3 will lead inevitably to State reliance upon the Federal Government to enforce the local laws of the dry communities. As under the eighteenth amendment, so under the new proposal, responsibility will be shifted from the States, where it belongs, to the Federal Government; and once again the people of one section will be taxed for the enforcement of a law they do not want in order to relieve the people of another section of the burden of enforcing a local law which they do want.

Sixth. It is no simple matter to "regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold." The history of the liquor problem before prohibition is replete with instances of the ingenuity used to circumvent such regulation. I recall, as an instance, the so-called Raines law hotels. The problem is one which calls for constant vigilance by those familiar with local habits and sentiment. It can be effectively dealt with only by local legislation and local enforcement. To pretend that the National Legislature and a Federal enforcement body can cope with it is to deny the lesson of experience under the eighteenth amendment.

Seventh. And now let us examine the implications of section 3. Let us weigh just how much power we are conferring upon the Federal Government. Let us see whether we are in fact materially changing the now universally rejected system of nation-wide prohibition.

On its face, the power of Congress seems to be rather limited. It is by the language of section 3 restricted to the prohibition or regulation of "the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold." But I submit, Mr. President, that anyone familiar with the history of constitutional interpretation can entertain no doubt that this apparently limited power can be extended to boundaries now undreamed of and unsuspected by those who tender this joint resolution to the Senate. It is possible to cite illustrations of that fact from numerous branches of law. I shall limit myself to the history of the eighteenth amendment itself.

When that amendment was presented to the States for ratification, the prohibition it contained was expressly limited to liquors which were intoxicating and for beverage purposes. It did not contain any additional grant to Congress of power to regulate all liquors, whether intoxicating or not, whether for beverage purposes or otherwise. Like the joint resolution before us, it carried simply a grant of "concurrent power" to enforce the article of amendment.

What has been the development of that language? By virtue of it, Congress has prohibited the manufacture, sale, and transportation of nonintoxicating beverages, and the Supreme Court has sustained its action. (The National Prohibition cases, 253 U. S. 350.)

By virtue of the apparently limited language of the eighteenth amendment, Congress has regulated the local manufacture of liquids not intended for and unfit for beverage purposes. (Selzman v. United States, 268 U. S. 466, involving denatured alcohol.)

By virtue of it, Congress has prohibited physicians from prescribing malt liquors for their patients. (Everards' Breweries v. Day, 265 U. S. 545.)

By virtue of it, Congress has severely restricted physicians in the prescription of spirits to their patients, and the Supreme Court validated its action. (Lambert v. Yellowley, 272 U. S. 581.)

To all intents and purposes, the eighteenth amendment might have contained the additional clause that "Congress shall have power to prohibit or regulate the traffic in all liquors, intoxicating or not, for beverage, industrial, medicinal, or sacramental purposes."

This great expansion of the meaning of the eighteenth amendment was accomplished by use of the theory expressed in the Selzman case that—

> It helps the main purpose of the amendment, * * * to hedge about the making and disposition of the denatured article every reasonable precaution and penalty to prevent the proper industrial use of it from being perverted to drinking it.

In the Lambert case the Supreme Court called attention to what it called the "settled rule," that—

> Where the means adopted by Congress in exerting an express power are calculated to effect its purpose, it is not admissible for the judiciary to inquire into the degree of their necessity.

The test it laid down was whether the proposed extension was "adapted to promote the purposes of the amendment."

I confess, Mr. President, that my imagination is not sufficiently fertile to foresee all of the extensions which will be grafted onto section 3 should it ever be incorporated into the Constitution.

If Congress may regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors where they are to be drunk on premises where sold, then we shall probably see Congress attempt to declare during what hours such premises may be open, where they shall be located, how they shall be operated, the sex and age of the purchasers, the price at which the beverages are to be sold. Should this proposed amendment have the same development as the unfortunate eighteenth, then in aid of its power to regulate the sale of intoxicating beverages, Congress will probably arrogate to itself the power to regulate beverages which are in fact nonintoxicating.

Should Congress choose to prohibit the sales defined in section 3, then presumably it will be proper for Congress to hedge about that prohibition a whole host of prohibitions which would "promote the purposes of the amendment."

It is entirely conceivable that in order to protect such a prohibition the courts might sustain the prohibition or regulation of all sales of beverages whether intended to be drunk on the premises or not. And if sales may be regulated, so may transportation and manufacture. Obviously the whole chain of events from manufacture to consumption is a continuous process. Regulation of the earlier steps can always be justified as adapted to promote the purpose of the ultimate regulation or prohibition. If that is to be the history of the proposed amendment—and there is every reason to expect it—then obviously we have expelled the system of national control through the front door of section 1 and readmitted it forthwith through the back door of section 3.

Such action does not respond to the public demand. It offers no solution to the troublesome problem of national prohibition. That problem can be solved only through outright repeal.

As for the saloon—let us face the fact that it is beyond the realm of proper Federal action. The duty of preventing its restoration rests upon the State. In my judgment, the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States will insist upon the discharge of that duty. Consequently, I am fully satisfied that if we permit our Government to function as it was intended to function, through the States, we shall find that the people of each of the 48 States will adopt those methods which will, in accordance with local needs and conditions, most effectively bring the liquor traffic under control and actually promote temperance.

That was the policy pledged by the Democratic platform when it declared:

> We urge the enactment of such measures by the several States as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision by the States.

No other course is open to us. No one single national standard can prevail. That is the principal lesson of our experience with the eighteenth amendment. Federal guaranties are futile. At the bedrock of this entire question lies this immovable truth: That there is nothing the Constitution can say, nothing the Federal Government can do, which will successfully impose a rule of conduct upon a community except by the will of the people of that community.

The problem confronting us, Mr. President, is to choose between two alternative courses. Either the control of the local liquor traffic is to remain in the Federal Government or is to be restored to the States.

Under the régime of national prohibition our people have seen the growth of intemperance, the spread of hypocrisy, and loss of respect for law and authority—social changes which could not be observed with indifference by those who had a care for the welfare of our country.

We saw the delicate balance between State and Federal authority rudely disturbed and have experienced the pernicious effect of that disturbance upon every branch of our Government. We have watched the development of a country-wide national bureaucracy, everywhere exposed to the corrupting influences of contact with an illicit enterprise engaged in minting a fortune out of violation of law. In the face of staggering national deficits we were helpless to exact a tax from a traffic which prospered outside the pale of law. In the presence of a mountain tide of unemployment we restrained hundreds of thousands of bread-winners from their only opportunity to earn a livelihood.

Out of these social, governmental, and fiscal causes grew the demand for repeal. And only by the forthright submission of the question of repeal or retention can the issue be settled. It can not be disposed of by an empty formula which pretends to repeal but actually perpetuates the unbearable conditions which have brought this question to the forefront of political discussion.

I am aware that the opinion is held in some quarters that the American people will not ratify an amendment providing for straightforward repeal. That decision lies with the American people. No one can speak more eloquently for them than the people themselves. And unless they have changed their minds since last November they have spoken out clearly in opposition to equivocation and sham and in favor of the thoroughgoing abandonment of the policy of national prohibition.

Our constitutional function is not to ratify, but to submit. In discharging our function let us courageously frame a resolution which will offer to the American people an honest and genuine choice between the eighteenth amendment and its repeal.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, at the outset of the address delivered by the Senator from New York I offered a formal amendment, to provide that the proposed amendment shall be submitted to conventions in States instead of the legislatures of the States. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] called attention to the fact that earlier in the day and obviously during my absence from the Chamber the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the leader of the minority, had expressed his intention of offering a similar amendment. I have examined the amendment to which the Senator from Arkansas referred. It is intended to accomplish the identical purpose I have in mind, and in view of the Senator's announced purpose to offer that amendment, I withdraw the amendment which I tendered and which is now the pending question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should be entirely content to have the vote either on my own amendment or on that of the Senator from New Mexico.

I now offer the amendment, on page 3, line 2, to strike out the words "the legislatures of" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "conventions in," and on the same page, line 16, to strike out the words "the legislatures of" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "conventions in," so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 3. Congress shall have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

"SEC. 4. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Mr. President, I presented the amendment in written form at the beginning of the debate this morning, but I offer it now verbally and ask for a vote on it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the amendment I feel compelled to say an additional word in explanation of the view taken by the subcommittee to which this matter was referred and by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom they reported.

Theoretically, ratification of amendments to the Constitution by conventions rather than by legislatures is strictly logical. It is, of course, desirable, if convenient and possible, to get an expression upon an amendment to the Constitution by a body which has no other consideration to divert attention from the real question at issue. However, for practical reasons the convention system has never been adopted in our hundred and forty-odd years of existence as a Nation, and, I take it, because there are very substantial practical objections to that method of procedure.

It has been urged that it is within the power of the Congress, and that Congress should provide for calling these conventions in the various States, but I have been unable to learn of any Member of the Senate who takes the view that Congress has any such power. I am convinced that it is contrary to the most fundamental principles upon which our dual system of government is founded. As has been stated heretofore on the floor, if Congress did have the power, I undertake to say that at the present time, in the present depressed state of business throughout the country and with the necessity of exercising economy in every particular in which it can be observed, the Congress would not make provision, with all the attendant expense, for holding conventions in the 48 States of the Union for the purpose of getting an expression of the opinion of the people upon this particular subject.

Mr. President, I have made no estimate as to what the costs of such special elections would be, but, of course, they would be very considerable. That goes to the question of the power, but, of course, if Congress has any such power, it has power to go clear down the line and provide the qualifications for delegates to the conventions, the number of delegates, how they shall be elected, what shall be the qualification of electors of delegates to the conventions, and the laws in relation to the registration of voters and the qualification of voters, the supervisors, and all that kind of thing. However, Mr. President, that need not be discussed, because it is not a practical proposition at all. If the conventions are called, they will be called by the legislatures of the various States, as was done in the case of the adoption of the Constitution in the first place. The Constitution was submitted to conventions in the various States, but to conventions called by the legislatures of the various States. So we would have a question of the legislatures of the various States making provision for the calling of the conventions.

The legislatures of many of the States are now in session. In most of the States biennial sessions are called. It seems quite improbable that any amendment proposing to repeal the eighteenth amendment could be submitted in time to secure action by the legislatures now in session. Accordingly, it would be impossible to submit the proposed amendment to any legislatures until after the lapse of two years more.

Let us assume that it would be possible to get the amendment of repeal before the legislatures during the current sessions of the legislatures, and then that the legislatures would proceed to legislate concerning the calling of conventions, providing when and where they should be called, the number of delegates, whether the delegates should be elected by congressional district or by State assembly districts, or by other districts to be created for that express purpose.

Then would be the question of making an appropriation for the calling of a special election and making an appropriation for that purpose.

In some of the States in which the sentiment for repeal is overwhelming, as in the State of New York and the State of New Jersey, I dare say the legislatures might in their zeal in this matter provide for calling a special election some time within the next 2 or 3 or 4 or 6 months from now. But it is to be borne in mind that in order to be effective the amendment must be ratified by conventions in 36 of the States. I undertake to say that at least half of those States will not call a special election for the purpose of electing delegates to a State convention. They will let it go over until the next general election and then delegates will be elected without any special additional cost for the election. That seems to me the altogether probable result.

If the matter were submitted to the legislatures now and they could act upon it, we would get a determination of the matter quite promptly. If we submit it to conventions it is impossible to get a determination until after a lapse of two years before the conventions. But it is impossible to get the resolution of repeal before the legislatures of the States now in session. They will have adjourned before we can get it before them. They will not reassemble unless specially called by a special call of the executives until two years hence, and then they will vote on the election of convention delegates, and I am perfectly confident they will provide that they shall be elected at the next general election. So there is no possibility of getting this matter before a convention in the various States, I undertake to say in one-half of the States, before four years from the present time and then, if it is at a special election, at very great expense to the people of the United States.

So the subcommittee to which this question was referred, consisting of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], and myself all agreed, I believe, that it was unwise to submit the matter to conventions of the various States. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], who was chairman of the subcommittee, reserved his objections to the third paragraph of the resolution in relation to saloons, but all five members, upon careful consideration of the subject, in the interest both of expedition and of economy, deemed it wise to have ratification by the legislatures instead of by conventions in the various States.

The matter then went before the Judiciary Committee and, with a predilection upon the part of practically every member of the committee in favor of ratification by conventions rather than by legislatures, it went through the Committee on the Judiciary with a feeble protest from 1 or 2 of the 17 members of the committee.

Mr. BRATTON. O Mr. President!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. I think the Senator will recall that the vote was 8 to 6 on that question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I asked the secretary of the committee to give me the figures, and I have forgotten just what they were. However, the vote was decidedly against the system of ratification by conventions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. FESS. It appears that the prevailing opinion that led the party to adopt the convention plan was that if we provided the convention plan there would be only one question that would be before the convention after the delegates were elected instead of the many questions which would of course be pending before the legislature. I think what the Senator has said is tremendously important, but I am of the opinion that that is why the convention plan was designed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I quite agree with the Senator. No doubt that is correct. Theoretically that is a sound contention, but I submit there are practical objections to proceeding in that way, while in this particular case I am entirely satisfied that the sentiment of the various States will be accurately reflected in the action taken by the legislatures of the States. I can not doubt that the Legislature of the State of New York will vote for repeal; I can not doubt that the Legislature of the State of New Jersey will vote for repeal, and so on down the line.

I have no particular concern in the matter. It is a matter of no consequence to me how the Senate shall decide about the matter, whether legislatures or conventions, but upon careful reflection and with a decided predilection, among other reasons, because so declared in the Democratic platform, my predilection was in favor of action by convention. But it seems to me a perfectly useless expenditure of money and in the second place it necessarily defers consideration for a period of at least two years.

So I submit, Mr. President, that those who are eager for a repeal of the eighteenth amendment ought to give serious consideration to the matter and determine whether or not in their opinion, inasmuch as they seek to accomplish what they desire, the matter ought not to be submitted to the legislatures rather than the conventions.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think the Senator meant that it is absolutely necessary to defer action for a period of two years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Absolutely, unless special elections are called.

Mr. WAGNER. A special session of the legislature may be called to deal with the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes. No doubt a special session of the legislature might be called and a special election could be called for the election of delegates. There is no doubt about that; but who thinks that 36 States of the Union are going to the expense of calling special sessions of the legislature to act upon this question, and then follow it up with special elections to elect delegates to State conventions? They may want to do that in New York, but we will have something of a time, let me say to those who are eager to see the amendment adopted, in getting 36 States to ratify in that way. It seems to me it is idle to expect that we are going to get special sessions of the legislatures and then special elections to elect delegates.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire the opinion of our able colleague now speaking. Does the Senator from Montana insist or presume that before we can adopt the convention method or any convention method legally, the respective States would first be required to have an enactment by their legislatures prescribing what constituted a delegate, what would be the requirements or qualifications of a delegate, what geography he represented, and lay the foundation first in that way before the convention is actually called?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has accurately stated my position. I know of no other way of getting a convention except by legislative enactment by the legislature of the State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The question that is now being discussed by the Senator troubles me from the standpoint of the Constitution and the legal machinery, in spite of my unequivocal pledge both in the primary and in the general election to vote to submit the resolution to conventions, by which I feel, of course, bound unless an insuperable and impassable difficulty should arise.

Of course, it was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that Congress might at some time refer an amendment to conventions; otherwise they would not have mentioned conventions as one of the methods of ratification. Suppose that we submitted it to conventions without any legislation on the part of Congress undertaking to supervise the holding of the conventions or the selection of delegates, and upon that subject I do not ask the Senator to express an opinion now. I think there is a wide difference of view as to whether Congress has the power to do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Montana has already expressed his views.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize the Senator has, and I do not want to enter that field just now; but, assuming that we refer this matter to conventions without any effort on the part of Congress to regulate the conventions or fix the qualifications of delegates or voters, and the legislatures of the various States or any number of States refuse to take any action establishing the conventions, then what could we do about it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We could do nothing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would we have authority subsequently, in the light of the refusal of a number of States to provide for conventions, to enact a law of Congress forcing those States to hold conventions or providing qualifications for the delegates or voters, geographical locations which they shall represent in the conventions, and so forth?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am without any doubt of the conviction that Congress would have no such power.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it has power now to initiate the conventions and provide for them through the resolution of submission or subsequent statute, it would have the power later, would it not, to enact legislation dealing with the situation that might arise?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think so. If a State legislature refuses to enact the necessary legislation to call the convention, that amounts to a rejection of the amendment by that legislature.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there is nothing in the Constitution that says whether the States shall regulate and control and supervise the conventions, or whether the Congress itself might have the right to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is a matter of sincere and profound legal difference of opinion among lawyers as to whether Congress has the power or not. But I am troubled by the difficulty which may arise in the event that, say, 13 States should refuse to call conventions, refuse to allow this matter to be passed on in any way except in a negative way by inaction, which I think would be unjustified. I think, regardless of the view of the legislature on the question of repeal, if this is submitted to conventions, morally they owe it to the people of their State to provide a convention and allow them to pass on the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a matter addressed to the legislatures of the various States. If the legislature of a State refuses or neglects to enact the necessary legislation for calling the convention, that is tantamount to a rejection of the amendment by that particular State.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no power in the Federal Government to compel the legislature itself to ratify or reject an amendment to the Constitution. The same difficulty that the Senator from Montana has pointed out with respect to conventions applies to the legislatures themselves. If the legislatures do not wish to take up the resolution of ratification, there is no power to compel them to do so. If they do not wish to ratify it, there is no power to compel them to do so. The function of ratification, while a Federal function in the sense that it is created by the Constitution, implies State action. If the legislature is in session now, it can call a convention before it adjourns. If it is not in session now, it can call a convention in 30 days after it meets again. The difference in time in action on the resolution of ratification need not be more than 30 days. So that, as I see it, the primary objection raised by the Senator from Montana to carrying out the platforms of the two parties, platforms which declare that it is material as to how the resolution shall be ratified, is, in my humble judgment, not based on sound reason.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was simply going to say that I agree with everything the Senator has said with the possible exception that if the legislature itself does not provide a method by which a convention may be called, may not the people of the State themselves organize through committees and call conventions without the aid of the legislature? I do not think we can deprive the people of the right to assemble together in a convention if they desire to act upon such a question as this in that way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I would gravely doubt the validity of a ratification that depended upon a convention in any State not called by an act of the legislature thereof.

Mr. BORAH. I am quite free to admit that is the orderly way in which to call a convention; there can be no question about that; but if, as has been suggested, the legislature should refuse to act, could the people be deprived of themselves coming together in a convention?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me the way is open to them to elect a legislature that will call a convention instead of themselves holding a mass meeting, as it might be called. They can demand the election of representatives to the legislature who will vote in favor of legislation calling a convention.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the people can not amend their own State constitutions without an act of the legislature calling a constitutional convention.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. And no such mass convention or uprising of the people, whether it all converge in one place or whether it be by scattered resolutions, could do anything toward preserving the sanctity of the ballot and fixing the qualifications of voters or any other official act that would be recognized by any governmental function.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so.

Mr. BORAH. But suppose it should be certified to the Secretary of State of the United States that a convention of the people of the State of Kentucky had been held and that that convention had ratified this proposed amendment, would the Secretary of State of the United States go back of the certificate of secretary of state of the State in which the convention was held for the purpose of determining how the vote was cast or who voted or anything of the kind?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Montana will permit me to answer, assuming that the legislature, which is the official legislative spokesman of the people of the State, does not act at all—and I imagine in none of the constitutions of the States is there any provision for such a convention as we contemplate here in this resolution—and would never act, and that a sort of a rump convention would be called by the people to pass on this question, I do not believe the Secretary of State of the United States would be justified in recognizing its action unless it were a convention that Congress itself authorized or prescribed as a precaution in the absence of action by the legislature.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Arizona has some very interesting information upon that aspect of the matter, and I yield to him for the present.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I hold the same view as the Senator from Montana respecting the nonvalidity of a ratification by a convention which is not called by the legislature or authorized by a State, among other reasons, for the following:

On March 2, 1861, the so-called Corwin amendment, prohibiting Congress from interfering with slavery within the States, was submitted by Congress. That amendment was ratified by the Legislatures of the States of Ohio and Maryland. Later there happened to be in session in the State of Illinois a convention that had been called to revise the constitution of that State; that convention discussed the proposed Corwin amendment to the Constitution and ratified the amendment, or at least attemped to do so. The lawyers of that day argued against the validity of such ratification in Illinois, and Illinois was never included by historians or lawyers among the States ratifying, for two reasons, one of which, of course, was all-conclusive, in that the Corwin amendment was not submitted by the Congress to conventions, and, secondly, many constitutional lawyers pointed out that the convention in Illinois was not called by the legislature to ratify or to pass upon an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Arizona has not his memory fallen into error, in view of the pressure of many important matters upon him? Was it not the real issue that the convention then assembled in Illinois had not been directly authorized or in any wise qualified by any previous call to take up that subject matter? Was not that the case?

Mr. ASHURST. I would be offensively presumptuous to place my knowledge of history, especially as to the history of the State of Illinois, against the knowledge of the learned Senator from Illinois; but I am quite certain that the lawyers of that day—respectable in character and numbers—held, even if that proposed constitutional amendment had actually been submitted by Congress to conventions, that the particular convention in Illinois had no authority to ratify an amendment to Federal Constitution as it was not called for that purpose.

Mr. LEWIS. I may remind the able Senator, Mr. President, that was the subject over which a very serious discussion arose between General Shields, a subsequent United States Senator, and Abraham Lincoln, which unhappily led to a duel challenge, because the one or the other, losing his temper, characterized the former as having told a lie and being both a liar and a fool, which is usually regarded among gentlemen as a basis for personal conflict.

May I ask the Senator if I am not right in saying that the particular gathering referred to was already in session, called for some other purpose, and that there were those who then projected before that convention the matter to which he now alludes?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want to get away from the immediate subject.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator recall that that was the reason?

Mr. ASHURST. The incident which led to the suggestion of the duel between Lincoln and Shields, the latter of whom was, by the way, sent to the Senate by three different States——

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; General Shields was a Senator at various times from Illinois, Minnesota, and Missouri.

Mr. ASHURST. That incident of the proposed duel occurred many years anterior to the convention, whilst the convention itself which acted, or assumed to act, on the amendment in Illinois was assembled after Lincoln became President.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, I have in mind the wrong convention and the Senator may be wholly correct. I have no memory of the history of the one after Lincoln was elected President.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I merely wish to make the suggestion that the differences of opinion and the discussion of possibilities here as to what will happen under the convention system in themselves, it seems to me, are more or less reasons why we ought to follow the method we have always followed of submitting proposed constitutional amendments to the legislatures of the States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have heretofore adverted to the consideration of this subject by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee to which it was submitted, and I have called attention to the fact that every member of the committee, Democrat and Republican as well, agreed, notwithstanding the provisions of the platforms of both political parties, that it would be eminently unwise, indefensible indeed, to submit this proposed constitutional amendment to conventions rather than to legislatures.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will allow me to finish this statement, I will yield. The clerk of the committee is not able to furnish me any information concerning the direct vote on the question of the excision of that provision of the resolution reported by the committee; indeed, my recollection about the matter is that there was no real effort in the Judiciary Committee to excise that and to substitute the legislative system. The clerk has no record of any vote on that at all. So we have only the vote in the Judiciary Committee and the general vote to report the resolution, which stood as follows:

For: BLAINE, HASTINGS, HEBERT, AUSTIN, ASHURST, WALSH of Montana, KING, DILL, BRATTON, NEELY, and SCHALL.

Against: ROBINSON of Indiana, SCHUYLER, BLACK, NORRIS, BORAH, and STEPHENS.

I feel perfectly confident of the assertion that no one of those voting against it did so upon the ground that the resolution was to be submitted to legislatures rather than to conventions. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he had given thought to and intended to discuss the propriety, in the event this resolution shall be submitted to the legislatures rather than to conventions, of providing that it shall not be acted upon by any legislature not elected after its submission to the legislatures, so as to bring about practically the same effect that would be brought about by the convention method, by having a direct vote of the people for or against candidates for the legislature on that question.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me on that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I see no necessity for that, for if a State should reject the proposed amendment it is fully within the power and authority of the legislature of the State subsequently to ratify it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but if it ratifies, it can not subsequently reject it if its ratification has been proclaimed and is a part of the required number of States in order to make the amendment a part of the Constitution.

Mr. ASHURST. That is quite true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. After it has taken effect the State can not change it; it may change it at any time until the 36 States have ratified; but I seriously question whether we have any power to provide that ratification must be by a legislature thus elected. I am inclined to think that if the proposed amendment were submitted with such a provision as that and were ratified by 36 States, including some not so constituted, it would be ratified, nevertheless.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there not a difference between that and the provision that sometimes is carried in proposed constitutional amendments that, unless it be ratified by the States within seven years, or any other period of years, it shall be null and void?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think so, because the Supreme Court of the United States has said that it is implied by the Constitution that ratification must be within a reasonable time, so that an amendment submitted in 1910 could not now be considered as a live thing to be ratified by States so that they might act on it now. The Supreme Court has held that ratification must be within a reasonable time after submission; and they have said that, under the conditions under which the amendment then before them was submitted, seven years was a reasonable time, and that Congress might so provide. So that is quite a different question from the power of Congress to provide that an amendment shall be ratified by legislatures the members of which are elected after the proposed amendment is submitted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course I would not put my judgment against that of the Senator from Montana, but my inquiry is prompted by the feeling that the Congress which submits an amendment to the Constitution in the form of a resolution has the power to fix the terms upon which it may be considered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No. If the Senator will say the "time," I might agree with him, but not the "terms."

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, in the absence of any prohibition or restriction in the Constitution as to the method of submitting resolutions except that they shall be submitted either to the legislatures or to conventions, it can not be successfully contended that Congress has no power at all to fix any of the conditions except as to time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not think of any other conditions that Congress might provide.

Mr. BARKLEY. I just mentioned one a moment ago, that it shall not be ratified by legislatures which are not chosen subsequent to its submission.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, silence is negation in such matters.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me say in that connection that the Senator will doubtless remember that there was a provision in the constitutions of a number of States which attempted to prohibit the legislatures of those States from ratifying amendments until the legislature was constituted of members who were elected after the question was submitted, and it was held that the people of the State could not thus restrict the power of the legislatures.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but that was an effort on the part of State constitutions to prescribe the conditions under which a constitutional amendment submitted by Congress might be ratified or rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is quite different, it seems to me, from the original body taking such action.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is different. It is a question as to whether the people of the States through their State constitutions can make a prescription such as the Senator suggests. The Supreme Court has stated they can not do that. The Senator asked me, "Can the Congress do it?" And my view about the matter is that the Congress is as much restrained from doing so as are the people of the States.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me, then, according to that theory, if the power of Congress and the power of the State legislatures is coequal, that the State legislatures, by a reverse system of logic, could pass a resolution and say that after 7 years or after 10 years if the legislative shall not act upon a proposed constitutional amendment submitted to it by Congress it shall not have further power to act. I am taking the position that the original body submitting the proposed amendment to the States has more power to fix the conditions of that submission than the legislature to which it is submitted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that the only principle upon which that could be justified would be the basis upon which the power of Congress in the premises is regarded as plenary when it makes provision for ratification.

Mr. SCHUYLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. SCHUYLER. I wish to state to the Senator that, while his statement of the attitude of the members of the Judiciary Committee is undoubtedly as he recollects it, yet I do think the RECORD ought to show that my vote against the favorable report of the joint resolution was based entirely upon the proposition that it contained a provision for the submission of the proposed constitutional amendment to the legislatures of the States. I took position against the measure and voted against it because I felt that we were bound to submit the proposed amendment, and that as a matter of principle, it should be submitted to conventions in the States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am thankful to the Senator from Colorado for the statement he makes. I quoted the matter, of course, from my recollection of what transpired before the committee; and I have no recollection that the Senator thus expressed himself before the committee.

Mr. SCHUYLER. However that may be, that was my position in the committee and my reason for voting against the submission of a favorable report.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I stated heretofore, I have no particular concern about this matter either one way or the other, whether it goes to legislatures or to conventions. What I have said is simply in the interest both of expedition and economy; but I do desire to say that it is my conviction that the provision of the platform in both cases ought to be regarded by this body as simply advisory. I do not think that any of the considerations which are now being addressed to this body were present in the minds of the drafters of the platforms at all. In other words, what they wanted was the submission of a proposition to repeal the eighteenth amendment. In that respect I regard the platform as binding and authoritative. The other I regard as incidental and simply advisory.

That is all I care to say about that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I seek the opinion of the Senator from Montana upon the following premise: Supposing Congress should pass an act directly authorizing a convention and prescribing, as it is an amendment of the Constitution we are repealing, that each State have a convention of, say, 2, 3, or no more than 4 from each county, they to have the qualifications of members of the legislature of the respective States, and they then assemble. Would not the Senator from Montana regard such prescription as sufficient qualification, and the very prescription by Congress as legalizing such as a convention within the meaning of conventions for the amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if Congress has power to legislate in the matter at all, I have no doubt Congress could provide that there should be conventions held, designating the time and place, and providing that the delegates to the convention should have the qualifications requisite for election to the lower house of the State legislature, or any other provision; and it could also provide that all State laws in relation to elections should be applicable to such an election, without going into the details. I have no doubt that that could be done; but to start with, of course, I dispute the proposition that Congress has any power to legislate in the premises at all, because, as I say, if it can legislate in the way the Senator suggests, it can go clear down the line and provide all the machinery for the election different from that which is prescribed by the States; and I do not think there is a Member here, at least from the South, who wants to accord any such power as that to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask our friend from Montana, in what way, then, does he assume that the convention system as provided under the Constitution could be carried out?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly as it was in the first place. The legislatures call the conventions and prescribe all the qualifications, and provide that the general laws in relation to elections shall be applicable to the election of delegates to the conventions, or make any other provision that they see fit to make.

Mr. LEWIS. But the Senator, as I gather from him, assumes that that provision of the Federal law which permits repeal by convention does not authorize the body that gives permission to call the convention, and authorizes the convention, power to prescribe the method of summoning that convention.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think, as I said before, that that is contrary to the most fundamental principles of our dual system of government; namely, that all elections are under the control of the States themselves.

Mr. LEWIS. Then does not the Senator see that the evil might follow that the States then could really call the conventions with a view to subverting and defeating the very object the Federal Government had in prescribing conventions?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the only object of the Federal Government is to submit the matter to the various States. That is all the interest the Congress has in the matter.

Mr. LEWIS. I think there is where the able Senator and myself have a very decided and wide difference. Provision is made for submission to the legislature, yes. That is intended for the respective sovereignties; but the reason why conventions are provided for, in addition to the legislatures, is in order to provide a method apart from the legislatures, to get away from the legislatures of the States, and to provide one that is directed by the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I differ very radically from the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. There is where our difference lies.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The idea undoubtedly was to submit the matter to a body elected with that one issue before them, and nothing else.

Mr. LEWIS. And yet the Senator feels that in a case like this we could not ourselves, in a mere directory statute, direct those conventions by prescribing that they may be called in each State with qualifications such as their local law prescribes for members of the legislature?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My conviction on that point is very definite and sound.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I do not know how Congress could provide a convention at all.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator will recollect that I was a member of the subcommittee which considered this amendment, although that fact escaped his recollection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I gave the Senator's name when I mentioned the names of members of the committee.

Mr. HEBERT. However, I have no quarrel with that. The Senator will recollect, too, that we discussed at very considerable length the question of reference either to legislatures or to conventions. My own notion was, and still is, that the amendment can be referred to conventions.

The Senator will have in mind that the Supreme Court decided that whenever a legislature passes upon a constitutional amendment it performs a Federal function; and by analogy it seemed to me that if we were going to submit an amendment of this kind to conventions they would be performing a Federal function; and, following that analogy one step further, if they are going to perform a Federal function it is within the power of the Congress to say how that function shall be performed.

There was another point that arose in our discussion of this amendment, to which the Senator alluded at the beginning of his remarks and upon which I now wish to interrogate him.

The Senator referred to the expense that would be involved in holding these conventions. I had hoped that the Senator would have made some estimate or made some inquiry about what would be the cost of providing for holding these conventions in the several States to consider the ratification of this amendment, if he has given it any consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I have not. I am not able to supply any figures at all on the matter, but I should think the aggregate would be very great.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator from Montana admit that when a State legislature is called upon to act upon a constitutional amendment, it is performing a Federal function?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the Supreme Court has held.

Mr. GLASS. Well, it ought to have held differently.

Mr. HEBERT. Yes, Mr. President; if the Senator will yield, the Supreme Court held that in the Ohio case, involving the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. GLASS. As it seems to me, it is performing strictly a State function.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I made reference to that myself in a brief statement.

Undoubtedly the Supreme Court has held that the ratification of a constitutional amendment is a Federal function; and that is strictly and legally correct, as the Senator from Virginia will see when the fact is pointed out that the power of ratification is derived from the Federal Constitution, and not from any act or constitution of the State.

There is a clear distinction between a Federal function and a State action. The function that the State performs whether it acts by a convention or by the legislature, as the Senator from Montana has indicated, is a Federal function.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me remark in that connection that under the original Constitution Senators were elected by the State legislatures; but that was a Federal function which the State legislature was exercising.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Because the Federal Constitution authorized their election in that way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For that particular purpose, it was an agency of the Federal Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But they were ambassadors of the States; and the action was taken by the legislatures, and not by any Federal agency.

Mr. GLASS. In my layman's view, the Federal function ceases when the Congress of the United States submits a proposition to a State legislature; and the State function preceeds when the legislature acts, either for or against the question submitted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me that is largely a matter of terminology.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course this whole phase of the discussion is academic.

Mr. GLASS. I am engaged in it because I have Mr. Jefferson's authority for saying that you lawyers never can decide a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana further yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The question might become of practical importance; but in passing upon this joint resolution it is not essential to determine the exact limitations on the Federal power and on the power of Congress nor the extent of the authority that is vested in the State by virtue of the constitutional provision which authorizes the ratification of amendments.

It seems to me that it can not be very profitable to carry on an academic discussion about what might happen if something occurs that is not likely to happen. What I should like to do is to hear the Senator from Montana further on the more practical aspects of the matter, if he cares to submit further observations regarding them. I am very much interested in his views.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have said all that I care to say on that feature of the matter before the Senate.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to make this observation, in order to keep the record straight:

When this joint resolution was before the full Judiciary Committee the Senator will recollect that a motion was made to have it referred to conventions and not to legislatures. For the purpose of the RECORD, I desire to state now that I voted to have that change made in the joint resolution. I also voted to eliminate the third paragraph of the joint resolution, which provides for conferring concurrent power upon Congress and the States to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquor to be drunk on the premises where sold.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will be kind enough to indulge me to "follow through," so to speak, on a thought that I expressed, but left without clear definition, I said that it was said that this is more or less an academic discussion as to the power of the Federal Government through the Congress to impose the conditions under which the conventions shall be held. What I meant by that is that even if the power be conceded, I do not believe that the Congress should attempt to exercise it to the extent of supervising the elections or defining the qualifications of the delegates. I am sure that if the Congress should decide to do that, and attempt to do it, it would result in the defeat of ratification in a large number of States.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. Following the observation the Senator from Arkansas has just made, it has never seemed to me that Congress should limit the power of the States to provide for the election of delegates to a convention any more than Congress attempted to limit the power of the States to choose their representatives in the legislatures for the election of Senators when Senators were elected by the legislatures. In other words, Congress never fixed any limitation upon the method of electing members of State legislatures who were to choose Senators in the Congress of the United States, and I see no reason now why Congress should attempt to fix a limitation upon how delegates to a convention for the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution should be chosen.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator will agree that if Congress has the power to fix the time when the conventions in the various States shall assemble, and the number of delegates to the conventions, and other details of that kind, it may likewise prescribe how they shall be elected, by congressional districts, by assembly districts, or otherwise.

Mr. HEBERT. I concede that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the Senator would be obliged to concede, I suppose, that if Congress has the power to do that, it can provide what the qualifications of the delegates shall be.

Mr. HEBERT. I have felt that Congress had that power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the Senator would contend that Congress, although it might not exercise the power, could exercise the right and power, and has the authority, to go to the very limit and regulate the elections, just as they are regulated under our State statutes.

Mr. HEBERT. It seems to me that that is an absolute concomitant of the whole thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That argument was made in an elaborate discussion of the subject by Mr. A. Mitchell Palmer, once an Attorney General of the United States, but I did not know the Senator from Rhode Island subscribed to that view.

Mr. HEBERT. I am inclined to agree with that theory of the method of putting an amendment into the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. However, I think perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island would agree that there is no probability that Congress will do any thing of the kind.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The question I intended to address to my able friend from Montana has been put by the Senator from Rhode Island, the premises assumed by him, conceded by the Senator from Montana, if it can be admitted that the Federal Government has such power. The Senator from Montana takes the position that though it may be that the Federal Government could, on the question of amending the Constitution, prescribe the qualifications of the delegates by prescribing that certain standards which prevail in the States as to the legislatures should be the standards in the selection of the delegates to the conventions, yet the Senator takes the position that while that directory form of statute would be a method of prescribing the qualifications, there is no power on the part of the Federal Government for prescribing a method.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; either general in its expression or in detail.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I ask the Senator this question, and, in conclusion—we have carried the inquiry too far afield. If it were not the intention of the provision that allows conventions as distinguished from legislatures to imply power to prescribe a method of calling a convention that could be controlled by Congress, would not the result be, if only the State could prescribe the method of selection and the qualifications of the delegates to the convention, that States which were averse to the Federal Government, or the purpose in view, could prescribe such qualifications and limitations as to the delegates as to practically defeat the very amendment itself?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So they could, but they could defeat it by refusing to call conventions at all.

Mr. LEWIS. But if Congress calls the conventions, merely directing the States as to the qualifications, would not that be a fulfillment of the statute? Otherwise, why have a convention?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The States could be entirely ignored in the matter, and Congress could go on and make all needful rules and regulations, if it had any such power. My contention is that it has not.

Mr. LEWIS. The difference lies in the fact that the Senator from Montana does not conceive that the Federal Government has the power to do it, without regard to the qualifications.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to carry out what I believe to be the logic of the view taken by the Senator from Rhode Island and others who agree with him, assuming that Congress has the power to fix the qualifications of the members of the State conventions called to pass on an amendment to the Constitution—which I do not agree to for a moment—would it not really follow, even though it did not follow as a legal proposition, that it would be incumbent upon Congress to pay the expenses of the convention out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a necessary consequence, it seems to me.

Mr. NORRIS. Otherwise it would be within the power of Congress to put a burden upon the State which the State would not want to assume. Of course, it would not have to, and it might be the very cause, if we undertook to fix the qualifications, especially if we made the matter expensive, of many States declining to do anything.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Nebraska recognize that the Federal Government does not pay the expenses of the elections of Representatives in Congress from the various districts in the different States?

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. LEWIS. Would not that be an exact parallel?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's theory is correct, and the Federal Government is going to direct the States to pass on this amendment by conventions, if we have the right, and then go further and say how big the conventions shall be, what their membership shall be, and what the pay of the delegates shall be, we could saddle upon the States conventions that would be absolutely obnoxious to many of them in the one item of expense.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, upon the same theory, then, the States could decide and determine not to call any convention at all, even authorized by the legislature, as beyond its ability to stand on account of the expense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me submit to the Senator this question: If Congress had the power to prescribe the method of holding the conventions, and so on, how could Congress impose that burden upon the States? The Constitution provides that each State shall be entitled to representation in proportion to its population, to be determined by Congress, except that each State shall have at least one Representative in the House of Representatives. But we do not compel a State to elect Representatives. If it does not want to pay the expenses of holding an election for Representatives, it will not have any Representatives. So that if we undertook to put the expense of holding the convention upon the States, they might not hold any conventions. Suppose Congress says the States themselves shall hold conventions at certain times and places, and the State of Illinois, for example, goes on and provides all the machinery for that purpose, and we assume that the State of Illinois must pay the expense. How is the United States to collect the expense from the State of Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator that I never conceded that Congress would have the mandatory power to say to Illinois, "You shall hold an election," and that an act passed here could give it the power to prescribe that the qualifications for members of the legislature of the State should be the qualifications for members of a convention.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But we are speaking about the expense. The Senator suggests to the Senator from Nebraska that the expense need not be assumed by Congress in that event; that it may be imposed upon the States.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How could it be collected?

Mr. LEWIS. It could be imposed upon the State just as is imposed the responsibility of electing Congressmen. That is imposed upon the State, although the Congressman serves as an official of the Federal Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Constitution provides that each State shall be entitled to so many Representatives. If it does not hold elections, it does not have the Representatives, that is all. We are speaking about the cost. It is assumed Congress is to call a convention and prescribe the qualifications, and then say, "We are not going to pay the expense of it, however. The States must pay the expense."

Mr. President, that is all I care to say about that. I want now to say a word in respect to the third paragraph of the amendment.

Both the Democratic and the Republican platforms declared that public opinion has outlawed the saloon. The Senator from New York says that the public opinion of the Nation has outlawed the saloon, and he insists that the State of New York will pass the requisite legislation outlawing the saloon.

It occurred to the committee, in preparing this joint resolution, that the third paragraph of the resolution submitted for the consideration of the Senate now would be a declaration by the Congress of the United States that public opinion in the United States is against the saloon, and that that would act as a very powerful suggestion to the States of the Union that they ought to legislate accordingly now that the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes becomes permissible; that they ought to legislate in relation to the saloon. We simply desired to reserve to the Congress the power, in case the legislatures of the various States do not do so, so Congress might do so. Furthermore, it occurred to all of us that the amendment would help to get ratification by the requisite 36 States.

Of course, the Senator from New York is perfectly confident that the amendment will be ratified by 36 or possibly by 48 States and he may be right about it. My judgment is that it will not be so easy as that. A bare repeal amendment would go along all right enough in some of the States, and in possibly half of the States, but there would be the borderline States in which the sentiment against the saloon is definite and is acute, and inasmuch as it seemed to us likely that the States would legislate in relation to the matter anyway, there would be no occasion for Congress legislating upon the matter, and that this would help in getting the requisite number for ratification. Those were the considerations which influenced the committee in including this provision in the repeal resolution.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator, since this section gives concurrent power to Congress to regulate or prohibit the saloon, it gives equal power to the States, does it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would not put it that way, because the States have that power anyway. We simply say that the Congress shall have concurrent power with the States; that is to say, the States have the power, and we give the power also to the Congress.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the power under this proposed amendment and under the existing power of the States is both in the States and in the Congress to regulate and prohibit the saloon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under that power the State of New York could legalize the saloon, and, at the same time, the National Government could prohibit it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. BROOKHART. Both acts would be constitutional, and we would have a state of civil war existing between the State and the National Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; there would be no trouble at all. If a man were indicted in the State of New York for running a saloon, he could refer to the statutes and say, "There is no statute of the State of New York prohibiting that." But over in the Federal jurisdiction they would indict him under the Federal statute, and he would be prosecuted for running the saloon.

Mr. BROOKHART. Suppose the State of New York made the saloon legal by affirmative enactment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The State of New York could not make the saloon legal as against a Federal statute. It would be a nullification of a Federal statute.

Mr. BROOKHART. It could not if the Federal Congress had full power, but when it has only concurrent power, it looks different to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no trouble about it at all.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. In the correspondence which I have had on this subject, and it has been rather voluminous, there has been much criticism of the particular clause in the proposed amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From Rhode Island, I suppose?

Mr. HEBERT. From every State, I may say; though I do not remember any particular instance from the Senator's own State. The use of the word "concurrent" appeared to be offensive to many people.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon an interruption, that has always seemed to me a most marvelous thing. When the eighteenth amendment was before the Supreme Court of the United States elaborate arguments were made in relation to the word "concurrent," and it was contended there would be no crime unless both the State legislature and the Federal Congress made the thing criminal. The Supreme Court dismissed it without any trouble at all.

The Senator will perfectly well remember in his study of the Constitution and the textbooks dealing with the subject that the powers of Congress are classified as exclusive or concurrent; that is to say, powers in which Congress alone can legislate and other powers in which Congress can legislate or a State legislature may legislate, either one or the other. When we had the child labor amendment before us an effort was made to put in the same provision, which seemed to some of us most feasible, that Congress or the State legislatures might both legislate upon the subject of child labor. Some of the ladies who were very eager to have the amendment adopted emitted such a howl about the word "concurrent" that we actually took it out.

Mr. HEBERT. I think the Senator will bear me out that we concluded to use the word "concurrent" in this part of the amendment in order that there might be no question about the power of the States to legislate on the subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. HEBERT. We felt that if we did not use that term it might be argued, and perhaps successfully, too, that we intended to leave to the Congress the sole right to regulate the sale of liquor in that way. But in order that there might be no question the word "concurrent" was inserted there.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator has quite accurately stated the views of the committee.

Mr. HEBERT. Of course, there is the further observation that if a State, as has been said by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], shall license saloons and the Federal Government shall prohibit the licensing of saloons, we are going to get right back into the same condition under which we are now living so far as the sale of intoxicating liquor is concerned. The Federal Government will take precedence by its enactments over those of a State so far as the offense committed against the Federal laws may be concerned. The Federal Government can prosecute for violation of its laws even though the State would permit that to be done which the Federal law prohibits.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will remember that under the old system a State might authorize the sale of liquors, but the Federal Government provided that no one should sell any liquor unless he first paid a tax into the Federal Government. The Federal Government prosecuted the people who were carrying on a business which was perfectly legitimate under the State law.

Mr. HEBERT. May I observe that the Federal Government in those cases did not prosecute for violation of a law against the sale, but because no tax had been paid.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Selling without payment of a tax.

Mr. HEBERT. But it was not a violation of the law as we are considering it now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me fully so. The Federal Government made it a crime to sell without first having paid an internal-revenue tax, and although a man was carrying on a business strictly in accordance with the State law, still he ran afoul of the Federal statute. We would have the same thing here. If a State legalized or permitted or tolerated the saloon, of course we could not prosecute a man under the State statute, but if we had a Federal statute he would run afoul of the Federal statute.

Mr. HEBERT. I am aware of the argument that was under consideration when we had the matter before the committee, that it would materially assist in the adoption of the amendment in a number of the States where otherwise the amendment would not be apt to be looked upon favorably. I think there is some merit in that argument.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that is where I wanted to interrupt the Senator a little while ago. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me now?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. He referred to it before and I was not allowed to correct what I believed to be an implication that might come from the Senator's remarks. But the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] has referred to it again.

I agree with the Senator from Montana and also with the Senator from Rhode Island. In my judgment this very provision will assist in its adoption in some of the States. But the Senator from Montana made a statement, and I think he was referring to the Judiciary Committee when he said "all of us." That does not apply to me. I do not know to how many others it applies. We will all concede it would help to get the amendment ratified, but it had nothing to do with my vote. I supported the amendment because if we were going to have repeal, I want to keep the saloon out of business and I thought this was the only provision in the amendment that would do it. It has no other right to live, it seems to me, except to keep the saloon from coming back. That was my object and the only object I had in supporting that amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska how it is going to keep the saloon from coming back if Congress does not avail of its constitutional privilege to keep it out?

Mr. NORRIS. It will not. Just like any other constitutional provision, it will have no effect unless legislation is had on the subject. I agree with the Senator from Montana that the idea was that the States should legislate. They can enact any law they please; but if the States or any of the States provide for the reopening of the saloon, Congress, under this provision, will have the right to step in and enact a law that will prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

Mr. GLASS. If Congress does not step in, then the saloon will be back.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; then the saloon is back.

Mr. GLASS. And it will be back, too.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no question about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was moved to make these remarks simply because this matter has been discussed with some feeling of resentment toward the committee that is charged with endeavoring to defeat really the repeal of the eighteenth amendment or substitute something for general repeal that would be of no consequence. The conclusions of the committee were not arrived at hurriedly at all. They were the result of very extended discussion and deliberate thought, and I have endeavored to advance the reasons which impelled the committee to reach the conclusions it did.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, let me suggest this question to the Senator from Montana. We have talked a great deal about the sanctity of platform declarations. If, under their oaths and their consciences, the Judiciary Committee may utterly ignore one definite textual declaration of party platforms, why may not the individual Senators under their oaths and their conscientious conceptions do the same thing?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I know of no reason.

Mr. NORRIS. Surely, why not do it?

Mr. GLASS. The contention here is, particularly by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], that we are under some sort of solemn obligation to observe the text of party platforms.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Virginia seems to be directing his question at me. I want to say that so far as I am concerned, if anyone who thinks he owes an allegiance to any party platform and that to follow it up would conflict with the duty he owes to his country here as a Senator, he ought to have no hesitancy in casting his party platform aside.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator has heard over and over again the declaration here that the Congress is under obligations to obey the party platforms. Senators can not obey both of them because they are very different.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator. But it does not bother me any. I do not know how it affects other Senators to disregard the platform.

Mr. GLASS. If we can not obey both of them, I want somebody to tell me just how we are going to get a two-thirds vote in the Senate to submit the amendment to the States.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps we can not.

Mr. GLASS. Democratic spokesmen talk about a declaration of the Democratic Party and want to constrain us to feel that that declaration is superior to our own oaths. Why may we not impute to Senators on the other side of the Chamber as much regard for the sanctity of platform declarations as is asked on this side of the Chamber?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may do so. There is no objection to his doing it.

Mr. GLASS. I do not know whether we can. I want to find out whether we can or not. If we may impute that degree of adherence to the Republican Party platform, and the Democrats have not a two-thirds majority here, how are we going to submit the question at all?

Mr. NORRIS. Maybe we can not submit it.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think we can. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the debate has taken a very wide range. It is not my intention to prolong the discussion. My object is to address the remarks I shall make to the question before the Senate, the amendment which requires a choice on the part of the Senate between conventions and legislatures as the agency for ratification. This difference or issue has been treated by the able Senators who have spoken as a mere trivial matter. It was referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] as not substantial. The implication of the remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was to the same effect.

Mr. President, when the two great political parties of this Nation, the Democratic and the Republican Parties, laid down their lines of battle, we all recall how much thought and attention was given to the question of prohibition. Effort was made to formulate declarations of such character as would be calculated to invite the support of the electors. It is rather a singular thing, considering the fact that throughout the entire history of the Nation the only method of ratification ever resorted to was through the legislatures and that both political parties, when they were challenging public support, expressly declared for a different method of ratification from that which had theretofore been resorted to.

Some statement has been made that since there are conflicts on the subject in the two platforms, there is no practicability of anybody being loyal to the pledge on which he was elected; that he is under no obligation to keep faith with those whose support he asked on the basis of his platform declaration. I point out to the Senate now that whatever distinction may exist in fact or may exist in the imagination of Senators between the two platforms, there is one point on which there is no difference, and that point has relationship to the amendment now under consideration. When Senators wanted votes they said, "We will give the States a chance to pass upon the question of repeal and in order to make certain that the individuals who perform the act of ratification may be responsive to public sentiment, we will refer the resolution for repeal to conventions in the States chosen solely for the purpose of passing on this issue."

Oh, yes, there were differences of opinion as to the terms upon which repeal should be submitted, but there was no difference of opinion upon the method of ratification; and by the express language contained in both platforms it was declared by the great masses of the people to be of substance and of importance. Senators did not go on the stump and tell the people whose votes they were soliciting that they did not regard that declaration in favor of conventions in the States, chosen solely for the purpose of passing on this question, as of no importance. They appealed for confidence and support on the ground that they were going to make certain that there would be a reflection in the act of ratification or rejection of the actual will of the people who constituted their constituents.

There is a difference in submitting a question to a "lame duck" Congress and submitting an issue to a Congress elected on that issue; and that same difference, Senators, exists between submitting to a legislature composed of Senators in some instances elected six years before the issue arose and in submitting it to those who come fresh from the people, chosen as a result of the expression of public opinion, chosen for the one and only purpose of passing on the issue involved, of determining the act of ratification or rejection; and there is not anyone here who may be permitted to treat that as a matter of trivial importance.

However, the next statement made is that it is expensive to have conventions, and for that reason Senators on the other side of the Chamber wish to forget their platform pledge, and we on this side of the Chamber should do the same thing. Every two years in most of the States, and every four years in all the States, State conventions of a political character are held, and they are representative of every small political unit. Those conventions are not expensive. The cost of a convention in a State depends upon the will of the public and the will of the legislature. The delegates do not have to be high-priced public servants; and every man in this country owes some duty of free service to his country. He might once attend a constitutional convention or a convention called for the ratification of the constitutional provision without requiring those who selected him to pay liberally for his services. He might even contribute his own expenses, as every one of us do when political conventions are called. The cost, I repeat, is a matter that may be determined by the policy of the State in which the resolution of ratification is to be submitted to a convention; but the mere matter of cost is not sufficient, Senators, to justify us in disregarding the one pledge upon which there was agreement.

You on that side of the Chamber knew at Chicago, when you adopted the Republican platform, if you were as sober then as you are now [laughter]; you on this side knew when you adopted the Democratic platform, if you were as loyal to the will of the people as you ought to be, that there might be some expense incident to carrying out your pledge. You were not children; you did not appeal to the electors of the Nation to give you power and authority without recognizing the fact that in redeeming your pledges the public might be occasioned some expense.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator from Arkansas think there would necessarily be any more expense attached to a convention than there would be in imposing the duty on the legislature of putting in extra time in the consideration of this question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No. The whole trend of my argument, if I may style it such, is to show that you can have a State convention without any great expense to the public. They have two every second year in Missouri that do not cost the public anything, and every citizen, as I have already said, sometime in his life may properly be called upon to perform a public service without exacting pay from the people who honor him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agree with the Senator that the salaries of the representatives would be a rather small matter; but I thought that I stressed the point that the expense of conducting the elections would be considerable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There would be nothing but the expense involved in choosing the delegates to attend the convention, and we have that at every political convention which we hold. The Senator never went to a convention but that a large number of friends made some sacrifice and got together either at the corner grocery or at the crossroads, praised him for his great abilities and signal powers, and said, "Let us send him on to represent us." They did well, and they ought to do the same thing in the case of a convention called in the States for the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and choose able delegates.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding that when you were trying to get votes on this proposed issue you thought, both sides, that a convention as a means of ratification was of vital importance, let me read what was said in the platforms of the respective political parties. I first read from the Democratic platform, as follows:

To effect such repeal we demand that the Congress immediately propose a constitutional amendment to truly representative conventions in the States called to act solely on that proposal.

And yet there are Senators here who have said to-day that that was an unimportant declaration, that it was trivial, that there is no obligation to observe it.

I have read the declaration of the Democratic platform. Here is what my misguided friends on the other side of the Chamber said in their convention when they were attempting to get votes on a pledge that it was not necessary to redeem or to keep:

Such an amendment should be promptly submitted to the States by Congress, to be acted upon by State conventions called for that sole purpose in accordance with the provisions of Article V of the Constitution—

And so forth. I repeat that whatever differences may have existed between the two platforms that is the one subject on which there was complete harmony, and both expressly stated that it was important to submit it to conventions rather than to legislatures.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I suggest to the Senator, since both Republican and Democratic national conventions declared for ratification by conventions, that left no chance for the people who oppose the conventions to express their sentiments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; but it does show, Mr. President, that both political parties thought that the people desired the opportunity of expressing their will on this subject to representatives chosen for that purpose. The fact that both of them agreed to substantially identical language indicates that they thought that it was a popular proposal and they would get votes by incorporating it in their platform.

There is a great deal that might be said in favor of the convention plan. Representatives in the legislatures are not chosen, as a rule, with respect to any one political issue. Some of them serve for long terms and they may not be responsive to popular opinion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rather gathered the impression from the speech of our esteemed friend, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], this morning that the whole presidential election was determined on that issue.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. O Mr. President, I do not sympathize with that viewpoint. There were many issues in the campaign of 1932, and it is not my opinion that the liquor question was the principal issue in that campaign. I have never believed it, and I do not believe it now. I think there were problems of far greater importance than any associated with the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course it is not to be understood that I indorse that view, but I do think that when it came to selection of members of the legislatures the question of prohibition had considerable influence.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Montana mean to say that he regarded the liquor question as the most important question in the campaign of 1932?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not agree with that statement at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, the Senator agrees with me, I understand?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I misunderstood the Senator's statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But in the matter of election of members of the legislatures I think the question of prohibition had considerable to do with it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me reply to that.

In the legislatures composed of two bodies, one-half or one-third—it varies in the States—are selected as members of the senate every two years; and there is a strong probability that at least one-half and probably two-thirds of the members of the State senate in every State of the Union, or four-fifths in some of them, were chosen before this issue became acute; and I say now that there is sound sense and justice in preferring to submit the issue to delegates chosen with direct reference to that issue rather than to submit it to members of a general assembly who were not chosen with direct reference to that issue.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think it is a fair statement of my observation to say that I stated that the prohibition issue was the dominant issue of the campaign.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from New York did not understand me to say that?

Mr. WAGNER. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not hear the statement made by the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. I said it was one of the issues in the campaign, and was freely discussed, and the people did know the issue between the two platforms.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that is true, and I think the issue was a prominent one. I think in many localities it was given more importance than it deserved to receive; but no one can deny that when the Republicans and the Democrats started out to get votes they agreed on one aspect of the question, and that was that they would give the people a chance to express themselves through delegates chosen for that sole purpose.

I yield the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my observations will occupy but a moment. I am conscious of having taken too much time in interrogations passing between the eminent Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and myself, and, I may add, my interruptions of other Senators upon the legal aspects of the amendment.

It is my purpose to read decisions which I have in these volumes on my desk. I sought these cases to meet and oppose the expressed convictions of the able Senator from Montana and that of the distinguished Senator, the ex-judge from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. But to conserve time I withhold them for the present. I shall not burden this assembly with reading law books. I rather, for the moment, adopt the expression of Pitt, the second Earl of Chatham, before the House of Commons:

I come not here to read books bound down in dogs' ears; I prefer to address myself to that other—the ears that lead to the heart and mind.

Mr. President, I concur in what all the Senators have said; as to the mere method of how we submit the amendment for repeal is not in itself so very commanding, certainly never to warp the judgment of any Senator or to prevent him from adopting an independent judgment on the larger area of the action to repeal, and complying with the platform in its spirit and direction.

I make bold to call attention to the fundamental doctrine underlying the whole contention as to execution of the platform pledges. When the conventions chose, for the first time in three lifetimes of political history, to prescribe that this remedy of repeal of amendment of the Constitution they sought was to be by convention. Sirs, let it be recalled that heretofore rarely had the convention system been invoked as the agency through which repeal of an amendment to the Constitution should be adopted. It is significant that the political conventions, made up of eminent men of both great parties—thoughtful men—expressing the concrete judgment arrived at from long deliberations in the years just preceding, made the choice of repeal by convention because they felt this method made more secure their will being executed by that method than by the other. If it had been the purpose to adopt the one or the other as a mere matter of alternative, it would have been easily expressed "convention or legislature." Sir, if it had been with the object of having it by legislature, it would have been expressed "legislature." It can not but impress you that there was a significant object in the mind and some purpose in the resolve, when they found it agreeable to choose, for the first time in a hundred years, in the different political gatherings of our people in America, for repeal, the convention. The delegates elected chose the convention system as distinguished and apart from the legislature. Nor, sir, did they include the legislature, though the method was there provided as an alternative.

Senators, shall we not be frank? What was the reason for the change?—for weighty reason, we can assert, must have been in the mind.

It was that our people in all the States had seen themselves tricked by legislatures. They had watched some, out of corruption, cheat the constituency. They had seen others, in their wild race to other objects of private benefits, exchange one purpose in order to obtain another. The deception had, in different forms, been so practiced upon them that they hastened to adopt some other remedy and some other method than to abide by that from which they had suffered losses and defeats only lately in so many States of the Union. Therefore, the platform provision that commanded the repeal by conventions, we must assume, was adopted by the delegates as a system of their protection, also—for what they felt was a guarantee of obedience to their command.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has made allusion, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] some reference to the matter of party platforms.

Mr. President, I am not always a very sure party man. I have not always supported all people presented upon a label called a political party. I do not accept the idea that there is to be any sacredness attached to the mere fact that these declarations were placed on a piece of paper and sent forth as the declaration of a political party in the form of a platform. I wish it understood that I present the position that when we declared that the repeal should be by convention at the instance of the representatives of the people through their delegates, and they promised the people they would secure repeal by this method, and the people went out and voted affirmatively in support as their direction upon the platform, as must be gathered by the majority and the number selected, it was, as near as we could catch it, a direction from the people themselves apart from delegates that they desired this method adopted because of some reason wherein they felt more secure and more protected by the method thus proposed than that of the other system they had not endorsed—and the one that which they had not commanded—the legislative method.

Therefore I go further than the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], my good friend from New York [Mr. WAGNER], or my eminent friend from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I hold that as near as we could go to the people, we presented to them a system by which we said this particular relief could be afforded. When they sent, at the ballot box and from it, their decree adopting it, it was the order of the people that the method be employed. It was their direction that this particular system of convention be entered upon.

I ask, now has the time not come when some heed should be given to the direction of the people at the ballot box in America as nearly as we can gather their intent? Does the mere fact that we can find specious argument for eluding it, for violating it, or for abandoning it, justify us in doing so? Shall it not be correctly said that the very conditions of our country in this hour, the voiced lack of confidence the American people have in their institutions, the want of faith they have in the courts, the general feeling that there is corruption in all legislative bodies, the conviction that general treachery and deception exists everywhere, and which they hurl in their indictments of public speech and public press against the representatives in all the different degrees of political life—I ask, is not all this condition due to the fact that they have ever discovered that legislative agents ever find some way to violate the made pledge on the one hand and disobey the directions of the people on the other?

It may be that some inconveniences attach to the fulfillment. Is that a reason for denying it? It must be assumed that the people themselves knew that all the inconveniences which we summon up here were a part of the system they provided. It must be that they felt it all to be a part and—may I add the commonplace word—parcel of that which they tendered to us for obedience; that it all inured within the theory proposed, and it must likewise be assumed that in doing such, and putting such burden upon us, they felt from it all was some greater security, and they looked to it as some extra form of guaranty to themselves in adopting and prescribing that system.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, thanking you for your patience and expressing my appreciation, I say it is better that we go to the country in the fulfillment of their direction in any way we honorably and legally can execute it. Better, sirs, this course than that we infuse in their hearts this early, as Democracy enters its inauguration, before the new administration has been sworn in, that the very first act on our part was to find a method to avoid that which the public had directed at the ballot box. The people are seeking reform. They are asking remedy. They pray for salvation. Shall we demonstrate to them, in the very first illustration, our indifference to the promise we made them on the one hand or, to avoid obedience, set up a wisdom which we regard as superior to theirs, and that we seek to follow it because speciously, by some construction of what we call the law, we find some other method more to our judgment or to our convenience, or, if I may add the latter, because it may be of less expense?

I can not adopt such, and I pray you to indulge me to say I do not feel that this is an hour, nor is this a day, when we can play with the emotions of America nor that we shall trick the sentiment of mankind. The United States is in a condition at this day when everything that we can do which may invite the confidence of our fellow mankind needs now to be initiated, fostered, and followed. We should go as far as we can to bring back the faith we have lost, even if it shall be at a little expense of more trouble, a little more, perchance, of time. A fulfillment and a keeping faith of a promise will do a great deal to make them feel that all the past is condoned and that the future begins with a brighter morn and a surer day. While the matter may be small, and at present may not be so important to the great humble mass, yet to them let it be seen that there is no attempt to evade or to escape the pledge, but every effort to obey it. This will fill them with a new hope and new faith that in all other respects they will have the combined support of the legislative body in the fulfillment of all other pledges in perfect faith.

That is what is in my mind that leads me respectfully to insist that, so far as can be, in every manner that may be, we fulfill what the people have directed.

As I conclude, Mr. President, there rises to my mind that there is in the Merchant of Venice, I think, the declaration—

> My words gone forth can not be recalled.
> Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?
> No, not for Venice.

Our answer in this matter at this time is that our word has gone forth. Shall we lay perjury to our souls? No, not for office, nor for favor, nor for reward, but, in the fulfillment of the solemn duty of the promise, keep the faith that there may be no charge from any source that there is an attempt on the part of this honorable body to violate it or evade it for some ulterior purpose which will be charged against us in an hour when we seek the confidence of mankind in America.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am going to occupy the time of the Senate but a moment on this question, because it is very largely an academic question, so far as I am concerned.

As to the Republican platform, I disposed of that in the Senate of the United States last June, so far as I was concerned. I was not bound by it, and I think the people disposed of it on the 8th of November. Certainly the Republicans can not be asked to carry out a platform which was rejected in a most decisive way. It may be that on the other side there should be a conscientious feeling that they should carry out the platform upon which they were elected. But, so far as a pledge was concerned, there was no possible opportunity to have any expression of opinion from the people upon the subject, because both parties declared for the same thing, and if either candidate for President in the campaign mentioned it, I have overlooked it. I know that the President elect stated in a New Jersey speech that he indorsed the platform, speaking of it generally, and that he stood upon the platform, but, so far as this particular subject was concerned, I do not recall that it was ever mentioned or discussed in the campaign. I may be in error as to that. Certainly it was never accentuated by the President elect.

Mr. President, what I rose to say was this: My natural predilections were in favor of the convention system, aside from any platform pledges. We had this matter before the Senate when the question of the ratification of the income-tax amendment was before us, and we discussed it. We did not adopt the convention system, but it was discussed, and I expressed a preference at that time for that system. But I did say at the time that I thought there were serious objections to it, and the question was, first, of expense, and, second, the delay involved.

I have undertaken to make some estimate of what it would cost my State to hold a convention. It must be remembered that it contemplates a convention to which delegates will be elected, and that there may be a severe contest in the election of delegates in the State, and that it would be a very expensive proposition. I did not feel that I was justified in voting for a new, untried, and experimental proceeding which would be expensive at the best. Secondly, while I am not particularly anxious about action on the eighteenth amendment, and the question of haste does not concern me so much as it does others, yet I do think that when it is once submitted it ought not to be pending interminably, but ought to be disposed of as speedily as practicable, and in as orderly a manner. There will not be any convention system covering the entire Nation, or even 36 States, in my judgment, within the next two or two and a half years. Those were the two reasons why I voted against the convention system, and I felt perfectly free to vote as I wanted to vote, because I was not bound by any platform pledge.

In some respects I like the convention system better, but, as was said by the Senator from Montana, I think that in the state of public opinion now, with the feelings which prevail in the different States, the legislatures will record the sentiments of the people upon this question just as accurately as conventions would.

As to the power of Congress to provide for these conventions, I entertain no doubt that Congress has no such power. When the Congress has designated the body which shall ratify—legislature or convention—it has exhausted its power. It can not enter the State and set up a convention and provide for the election of delegates any more than Congress could enter the State and provide for the call of the legislature and control it. The theory that the Federal Government could enter the State and provide for a convention is violative of the most vital and fundamental principles upon which our dual system of government rests.

I reserved some freedom of action upon another provision of the amendment which I shall discuss later. I only wanted to say that, so far as this was concerned, I agree with the argument of the Senator from Montana in large measure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I feel impelled to say a word before the vote is taken on this matter touching one line of argument made in the usual passionate and forceful manner of the Senator from Arkansas, for whom, of course, I entertain the very highest respect. He called attention to the fact that in the legislatures as now constituted there are probably some considerable number of members who were elected quite a while ago. Undoubtedly that is true, but it will be borne in mind that those are the legislatures to which is to be addressed the question, Shall we call a convention or not? We meet with that objection in any case.

As I pointed out before, the amendment could be defeated by the simple failure of a State to call a convention; that convention must be called by the legislature, and the legislature is made up of men who were elected in the past, and not at this immediate time, after these platforms were adopted. So that in any case we would encounter the difficulty of having the real, essential meat of the thing submitted to a legislature not altogether elected after this matter became ripe.

I observe likewise that the Senator from Arkansas passed off very conveniently the question of expense by comparing the convention to be called with a political convention. Of course, political conventions are held, but without expense to the State at all. We go down into our pockets for those. But they have no validity whatever in law. We could not ratify an amendment by a political convention. We would have to provide for calling an election; we would have to pay the expense of conducting the election; we would have to pay the expense of transcribing the poll lists; we would have to provide for inspectors at the election; we would have to provide for certifying the election; we would have to do everything that is necessary in the election of any officer of government; and all of that costs money in these times, when every dollar ought to be saved that can be saved.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senate wants to vote, I shall be ready to stop talking any minute; I would rather vote than anything else. But I have been sitting here for two days listening to the debate, and it seems it is to go on probably until the 4th of March without any decision being made. So, since we are not to be able to legislate on the things on which we ought to legislate, I might just as well take some of the time as well as somebody else.

Mr. President, if I had not been living during the campaign, but had just come down here from some other planet and had heard the speech of my good friend from New York, I should have judged that there was but one issue in the last national campaign, and that that issue was prohibition; that nothing else was mentioned in any platform; that nothing else was talked about during the campaign.

Mr. President, if that were true, and if that had been the only issue involved, then I think it would follow that those who believed in the platform which advocated repeal of the eighteenth amendment would be in honor bound to take the first opportunity to bring repeal about.

I listened with great interest to the Senator from Arkansas. He referred to the lame-duck Congress passing on this matter. That is one reason why it has seemed to me all the time that we should not be wasting the valuable moments of this session of Congress in discussing something which is not binding on this Congress, according to the argument of the Senator himself. I take it at 100 per cent that those who want to follow platform pledges are not compelled or bound to carry them out until the people elected at the election go into power. If that principle had been followed, this question would not be before us now.

I concede that the question of passing on the proposed amendment by conventions instead of legislatures has a very cogent argument in its favor. Under ordinary conditions it would be much more impressive, I think, than it is under existing conditions.

A convention thus elected would have but one thing to do, and at the election at which the delegates were chosen there would be but one question involved. It would be in effect a referendum. But those who believe in ratification by conventions, when they commence to study what will be necessary to bring about a ratification in that way, commence to wonder whether they would be justified, under the present circumstances, in providing for ratification or rejection by conventions.

Mr. President, we are confronted now with the fact that millions of our people are starving; the Federal Government is almost ready to go into the hands of a receiver; the States are borrowing money by the millions from the Federal Government; counties, municipalities, subdivisions of government are doing the same thing, and if we provide for submission of this question to conventions, we are about to put upon the backs of the taxpayers of the United States millions of dollars of expense to carry out this simple mandate.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] argued that the expense would be trivial. It has been stated that political conventions do not cost much; that the taxpayers do not pay the expense. That is true. Sometimes the special interests pay it; sometimes the big corporations pay it. The conventions meet and carry out their edict and their will and nominate candidates and adopt platforms that will bring back manyfold the interest on the investments made by those corporations in the conventions.

But that is not so in this case. The people are going to pay the expenses. It will probably be a lively campaign in every State and in every district of the Union where conventions are called. Every dollar of that expense the taxpayers must shoulder. Suppose the State has a convention of 100 delegates. Probably in some instances in some States it will be a convention of 500 delegates. They travel from different parts of the State. They will be paid mileage. They ought to be. They will be paid per diems. They ought to be. Every penny of the expense of their meeting, although it will be short—though if there are many ex-United States Senators in it the debate may be lengthened considerably [laughter]—is going to be paid by the taxpayers of this country. We have 12,000,000 people almost starving to death, with every State going into debt and very few of them able to balance their budget. I think it is an important thing under the circumstances to take the expense into consideration.

I have great respect for the man who respects his party platform pledge, but of necessity a platform containing many pledges ought to be considered in the light of existing conditions. We can not take up any one of them and say that the country is bound by that particular pledge, or that particular plank was the issue which settled the election. That can not be said about the last election, either. Millions of people cast their votes in the last election who did not know that in either platform there was a provision that the submission of this question should go to conventions rather than to legislatures. I did not hear it discussed, and I listened to both of the candidates over the radio. It may be they discussed it when I did not hear them, but if they did nobody paid much attention to it. It is one of the methods of carrying out a platform pledge.

Suppose the platform provided that the ballots on which the delegates should be elected must be printed on pink paper. Suppose that was argued and seriously contended for, and it was discovered just before the election that we could not get enough pink paper upon which to print the ballots. Would anyone feel in his conscience that he had violated the pledge of that sacred party platform if we printed the ballots on white paper?

The main thing was the question of submission. It is true that in both party platforms it was pledged to be submitted in a particular way. I do not suppose a single delegate in either of the conventions had his attention called to the difficulty we were going to be in in the way of expenses alone. Many people thought, and some still argue, that the Federal Government should pay the expenses of the conventions, that the Federal Government should hold the election in reality, provide for qualification of voters, and so forth. I do not think anything of that kind would be constitutional, but whoever pays the expense it comes out of the taxpayer in the end. He foots the bill, and he can not afford to do it.

While I am on my feet, as I may not talk again on the question, I want to refer to section 3. Section 3 went into the joint resolution because it was deemed by those who framed it that it ought to be there to prevent the return of the saloon. We have heard about it during all the debate in the last four or five years. Everyone who advocated repeal of the eighteenth amendment always prefaced his remarks with the statement, "We do not want the saloon back. Nobody wants the saloon back." That has been inculcated in the minds of the American public until, when we mention repeal, unconsciously everyone's mind comes to the point that we can have repeal and not have the saloon.

If we take section 3 out of the amendment, there is no assurance whatever to prevent the return of the saloon. The return of the saloon will come without section 3, in my judgment, just as surely as we adopt the amendment. It will not come in all States, it is true; but it will come in many of the States. We will have the saloon back in business, the thing that everybody from candidates for the Presidency down to candidates for road overseer have denounced and said they would never submit to. As I look at it the only way to keep the saloon from coming back is by the retention of section 3. It was not the intention of the Judiciary Committee that the Congress would necessarily enact any law upon the subject, but if we take away the power of Congress to enact a law to prevent the consumption of liquor on the premises where sold, we have brought the saloon back into existence and there is no escape from it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me ask the Senator, under the wording of section 3, if the States have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in a saloon, is not that power just as high and just as dominating as the concurrent power of the Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. If the States would enact laws that would prohibit the saloon, Congress probably would never legislate on the subject; but if some of the States did not and other States did, then in order to meet the condition where the saloons came back into operation again in the States that had enacted laws that permitted it, the Congress if it wanted to do so could enact a law that would prevent the consumption of intoxicating liquor upon the premises where sold. If a statute was enacted and later we even permitted it, that would be no reason why the law of Congress should not be effective. One is a State law and the other is a Federal law. But if the Senator were a prosecutor on behalf of the Federal Government under those circumstances and prosecuted me for selling liquor and permitting it to be drunk on the premises where sold, under a Federal law, it would be no defense for me to allege and prove, if I were permitted to prove it, that the State law gave me permission to do the very thing I was doing. I do not believe any lawyer would contend that.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the State had concurrent or equal power with Congress, it seems to me it would be a defense. If I were prosecuting attorney for the State, then I would not want to yield to the Federal authorities.

Mr. NORRIS. In the case I put, if the Senator were prosecuting attorney for the State, he would be defending the criminal who was being prosecuted in the Federal courts.

Mr. BROOKHART. He would be no criminal under the law of the State.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, but he would be a criminal under the Federal law. If the Senator will think a moment, he will realize that in the entire history of the United States we have had laws similar to that.

Mr. BROOKHART. But let us take the eighteenth amendment. Under the eighteenth amendment, of course, the sale of intoxicating liquor is prohibited both by the State and the Nation. The concurrent power there is for the enforcement simply of prohibition. But here is a concurrent power to regulate it and to prohibit it, or not.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we take out that provision and suppose the Federal Government has no authority then whatever. Then where would we be? Would it not follow that the saloon would come back?

Mr. BROOKHART. No. I am more favorable to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], where he proposes to prohibit the saloon and transportation and then gives concurrent power of enforcement.

Mr. NORRIS. This gives Congress the power. It provides that "Congress shall have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit." We can prohibit or we can regulate.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the amendment which the Senator from Virginia has proposed provides that the sale of intoxicating liquors within the United States or any territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for consumption at the place of sale, commonly known as a saloon, transportation, and so forth, of intoxicating liquors, are prohibited.

Mr. NORRIS. I am familiar with the amendment. I remember when the Senator introduced it. It is really an attempt to define the saloon and to put that definition in the Constitution of the United States. I do not think any student of the subject who will think it over calmly will believe for a moment that we can put a definition of a saloon in the Constitution of the United States and properly enforce it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Have we not done that in section 3?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. BROOKHART. It uses the same language.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it will have the effect of keeping out the saloon, keeping out the thing "commonly known as the saloon." What is the saloon? If the Senator will take the various dictionaries and look it up, he will find it is a good many things besides what we are thinking about when we think of the saloon that sells liquor.

Mr. President, I want to say just a few words about what I term this unnecessary delay. For two days we have been considering this matter. We have only a few more days of this session left. Senators refer to the provisions and pledges of the platform of the Democratic Party and of the platform of the Republican Party as being a mandate in this case. I want to invite their attention to the fact that in both of the platforms there are promises that we will help the farmer, there is a pledge that we will help the unemployed, and there are a good many other promises along that line. While we are considering this proposition, which, in my judgment, could just as well have been postponed until the special session, millions of our people are suffering because the Senate of the United States is not acting upon those pledges and upon the greater pledge that must come from every pure heart of trying to help his stricken brethren in the terrible catastrophe in which we find ourselves.

We have 12,000,000 unemployed. We have a bill on the calendar that has been there for weeks that we ought to take up and consider for their relief. We have been talking and talking about helping the farmer. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported to-day a bill on the subject that was one of the pledges in both of the platforms that were taken before the people in the last campaign. The Judiciary Committee last week reported a bill along the same line to give relief, the effect of which would probably be to grant a moratorium to those who own their homes and have mortgages on them. These bills may not bring complete relief. Some of them may be failures. They may be experimental to a great extent, but at least when we are talking about platform pledges we ought not to forget pledges of that kind.

The joint resolution which we are considering now has been before us for two days. Every hour and every minute of the precious time wasted between now and the 4th of March means so much time lost for the consideration of those measures that should appeal to human mercy and human sympathy. There is nothing that ought to be hurried about the particular joint resolution which we are now considering. It ought not to be before us now. It would be all right if we had plenty of time to consider it, but when we ought to be devoting our time to things that are meritorious and admitted by all to be meritorious, and that would have a tendency to relieve the terrible suffering in the conditions under which our people are now living, I do not believe we can excuse ourselves for wasting those precious moments by taking up an amendment to the Constitution which, even if we ever get it past the Senate, it will be years before it goes into effect.

If we do nothing to relieve distress and suffering, the people of the United States will be bankrupt and most of them starved to death before this proposed constitutional amendment will ever become effective. It seems to me to be a sad commentary upon the wisdom of Congress that it should devote time, when time is so precious, to the consideration of this subject that must necessarily retard the consideration of other more important measures which we ought to consider and dispose of.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I realize as well as does the Senator from Nebraska the urgency of other measures now pending on the calendar, and for that reason I shall be very brief in what I have to say.

Mr. President, I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to submit this proposal to conventions in the several States instead of to the legislatures of the States. In the first place, it conforms strictly to the solemn pledge in the Democratic platform. It may be argued, and it has been argued to-day, that there are practical considerations which should move us to depart from that promise and, instead, to submit the question of ratification to the legislatures. Mr. President, the platform promise of the Democratic Party does not merely declare that this question shall be submitted to conventions in the several States, but it gives the implied, if not the express, reason why that system should be employed. It declares that it shall be submitted to truly representative conventions in the several States called specifically for that purpose, indicating clearly that it was the purpose of those who spoke for the Democratic Party in the national convention assembled at Chicago to appeal to the people of the Nation for their suffrage at the polls upon the definite promise that this important matter would be singled out and set apart from other issues, and would be submitted to representatives fresh from the people, elected upon the sole, single, and exclusive issue.

It may be said, Mr. President, that that promise was not a compelling or a controlling one, but who can say with justification that if there are 6 planks in a platform, 4 of them are controlling and binding and the other 2 are not?

Mr. President, this is a promise that was made by the national conventions of both parties to the electorate of the States. The argument now advanced that there are practical considerations why we should breach that promise, if you please, makes no appeal to me. Furthermore, as the Senator from Arkansas well said, in reply to the argument advanced by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], many of those now serving in legislatures in session at this time were elected prior to the platform pledge; and, accordingly, they were not elected, indeed they could not have been elected, with any reference to that promise, either direct or remote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator must realize that the same legislature, so constituted, must call the convention if we are to adopt the convention method?

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And they can defeat the proposal by not calling a convention?

Mr. BRATTON. Oh, yes; but there is this fundamental difference: A man serving in the legislature may well say that he has a fixed conviction either in favor of repeal or against it, but that, despite his individual view, he is perfectly willing to submit the question to the people of his State and let them elect their representatives on that sole issue, and if the people differ with him, their will shall be paramount and supreme.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I quite agree with the Senator that there may be such an individual, but, as a practical matter, does not the Senator agree that a legislature that will call a convention in all reasonable probability would vote to ratify the amendment?

Mr. BRATTON. That is a reasonable assumption.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and the legislature that will call a convention in all reasonable probability would ratify the amendment, and a legislature that will not call a convention would probably not ratify it; so that by submitting the question to conventions are we not really doubling the difficulties in the way of securing ratification?

Mr. BRATTON. I think not, Mr. President; with great deference to the opinion of the very able Senator from Montana, I must differ with him in that respect. I think there are those who as voters in their respective States will vote against the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, but as members of the legislatures are entirely willing to submit the question to the people and let them pass judgment upon it. Indeed, as a voter at the polls in my own State, I shall vote against repeal, but as a Senator I am willing to submit the question to the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BRATTON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that in this "buck-passing" age a legislature would prefer to call a convention and say they were doing it on the ground that they ought to provide the most direct way possible to pass on this question whereas if they were required to vote on it themselves they might vote against ratification? They might, however, justify calling a convention on the ground that it gave the people the most direct way possible, under the Constitution, to pass on an amendment of this kind.

Mr. BRATTON. I think so. The convention system, Mr. President, has two virtues: The first is that it is the most effective way to obtain a direct reflection of public opinion. It is trite to call attention to the fact that in electing members of the legislature other issues enter, other questions become paramount; the wet and the dry issue is submerged, and to a large extent sight is lost of it. That is not true in electing delegates to a convention which has the one issue before it; but that argument is trite. Every Member of this body is familiar with it. Coupled with it is a consideration of less importance to which attention has already been directed, namely, that many of those now serving in the legislatures were not elected either as "wets" or "drys," with reference to this particular proposal, and consequently their election can not reflect public opinion in their respective districts or within their respective States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BRATTON. With pleasure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I find that there is a widespread misunderstanding among the people touching the nature of the conventions referred to in the Constitution and in the party platforms. I find that many intelligent people who are familiar with the old-fashioned type of political convention, which was outlawed by the modern device of the primary for the nomination of candidates of political parties, have the idea that a political convention in which takes place the ordinary jockeying and maneuvering and trading and trafficking for delegates or for nominations of political parties is the kind of convention that will pass upon this proposed amendment. I think we owe it to the people to emphasize the fact that the kind of convention contemplated by the Constitution, and the kind that will be contemplated by us, if we submit the proposed amendment to conventions, is more in the nature of a constitutional convention ordained by the legislature to write a new constitution for a State, a nonpolitical convention than that it has any resemblance whatever to the ordinary political convention as the average man and woman now understands that term.

Mr. BRATTON. Yes, Mr. President. At the time the Senator from Kentucky interrupted me, I was endeavoring to say that the convention system has two virtues: First, it more directly and more accurately reflects public opinion, and, second, in this particular instance, it carries out and performs in toto a solemn promise of the party to which I and the other Senators on this side of the aisle pay allegiance. The resolution as it came from the committee presents a complete failure to carry out that promise. The justification for such action is that there are practical considerations why we should depart from the platform covenant.

Mr. President, is it not reasonable to assume that those who wrote the platform foresaw that it would require time to call a convention, that they foresaw that the calling and the conduct of a convention would entail expense but that they thought the consideration of higher and controlling importance was to obtain a more direct expression of public opinion?

It has been argued by some that the Congress has the power to call the conventions. I do not intend to indulge in a lengthy discussion of that matter. I disagree emphatically with the suggestion that Congress has any such power.

Mr. President, there are two systems of proposing amendments to the Constitution. One is to propose them to be ratified by the legislatures of the several States and the other is to propose them for ratification by conventions held in the several States. The moment the proposition is announced that Congress can call an election in the several States for the selection of delegates there is injected into the two methods this difference: Under one the States are entirely free, while under the other there is an element of compulsion or coercion upon the States, because when we submit a proposed amendment to the legislatures that may ratify the amendment, they may reject it or they may ignore it entirely. If the States are authorized to call conventions, we have a comparable system, for each State may call a convention and ratify the amendment, the State may call a convention and reject the amendment, or the State may ignore the proposal entirely. Thus the two systems are exactly on a parity so far as the degree of freedom of action on the part of the States is concerned.

When, however, it is said that the Congress may call an election and fix the day on which it shall be held and specify the mechanics of holding it, then we place over the States a hand of compulsion and coercion. Does anyone conceive that those who wrote the Constitution and the States that ratified it understood and contemplated that the two systems were so radically different in that important respect that one gave to the States complete and uncontrolled freedom to act or fail to act, while the other required the States to act, required the people to assemble at the polls on the day specified by the Congress and elect delegates to the convention? In that way we bring forward that important difference between the two systems. Significant it is that no such thought was advanced or expressed during the debate in the Constitutional Convention. Research fails to disclose that anyone participating in the ratification of the Constitution entertained any thought that there was such a difference.

Mr. President, the language of the Constitution itself indicates that no such difference was contemplated. Under Article V, the Congress has power to propose amendments.

That is the language of the Constitution—that the Congress has the power to propose and the States have the power to ratify. The moment the Congress has proposed an amendment, specifying whether it is submitted to legislatures or to conventions, that moment the Congress becomes functus officio. It has nothing more to do with the matter. The function of proposing the amendment has been completed. All subsequent action relates to ratification—a State function. The matter of calling an election, the matter of selecting delegates, the matter of the delegates assembling, the matter of the convention voting in the affirmative or in the negative—these matters are all component parts of the process of ratification. That is a function of the States.

It has been urged that that is a Federal function. I think that is a play upon words. Assume that it is a Federal function: It is performed by the States, and they have utter freedom to determine for themselves whether or not they will exercise it. A State may elect not to act. It may ignore. It may remain utterly indifferent to the proposal. There is no power to require a State to act either favorably or unfavorably.

So, Mr. President, I do not share the view that there inheres in the two systems the vast difference to which reference has been made. I do not believe it was contemplated or understood or believed by those who wrote the Constitution. Neither do I believe that it was thought by the States ratifying the Constitution that through one system the State is free, while under the other it is not.

Congress proposes an amendment, specifying whether it shall be acted upon by legislatures or conventions. When Congress has thus proposed, Congress has fulfilled its functions under the Constitution, and the States then proceed to ratify, reject, or ignore.

As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] pointed out, a great many people throughout the country believe that the kind of a convention we are talking about is one held without regulations, without sanction of law; that it is a mass assembly to elect the delegates to the county convention, and then on to the State convention. Obviously, anyone who has given study to the proposal will concede that the convention must be called by an act of the legislature, fixing the time and place of electing delegates thereto, specifying the qualification of voters, and all other matters relating to the details of holding and conducting the election and canvassing the returns and declaring the results thereof. It is an official convention, called under an act of the legislature. It has the sanctity of a legislative fiat upon it. It is not a mere mass assembly.

The Senator from Kentucky rendered a real service when he called attention to that misconception quite prevalent throughout the country.

Mr. President, while freely conceding that ratification by conventions will delay action, while freely conceding that it will entail expense, I think there arises above those two considerations the one of higher importance, and that is a solemn promise made to the electorate of this country that this proposal would be submitted to truly representative conventions in the several States called for that purpose; and to submit it to the legislatures is a complete departure from that promise; it is a complete failure to carry out that pledge. Accordingly I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I am in opposition to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Every constitutional amendment that has ever been submitted has been submitted to and ratified by the legislatures of the respective States. The legislatures and their assemblage and their personnel constitute a fixed institution of their respective States. They certainly reflect the proper sentiment of their respective States on public questions.

The theory that the legislature that was elected last November would not properly reflect the sentiment of the State with reference to any public question, it seems to me, is a misstatement of the facts. The fact is that the legislature is a fixed institution in the State. It is a method certain by which this amendment can be submitted to the States for their decision.

On the other hand, if we decide that we are going to submit this amendment to conventions, suppose a State legislature should say, "We are going to have a mass convention and let the people meet en masse and determine whether or not they want to ratify this amendment." Suppose, on the other hand, they should say that the respective counties shall have so many delegates at a State convention, and nothing be said with reference to how those delegates are going to be selected. Then it would simply be a contest of the old-type caucus system that we used to have in years gone by, as to who could go in there and count noses and control those county conventions. In other words, we go back to an old system that was relegated to the past when the primary system was adopted, and say that in order to get a decision on this question we ought to abandon ratification by State institutions, and accept some convention system that we have never accepted before; and in most of the States of the Union the conventions are not regulated in any way so far as delegates and representation are concerned.

In other words, we are subjecting this amendment to the will of the legislatures as to how they want to handle this matter. It seems to me we are doing that which we should not do.

In the second place, a great deal of stress is put on the fact that both the Republican platform and the Democratic platform declared for the convention system. I want to suggest something that was in the minds of those who had to do with formulating those platforms. It was speed; it was "Beer by Christmas." It was trying to get early action, thinking that they were going to have this matter determined almost instantly.

Now, as a matter of fact, it has been found that Congress can not specify how these conventions shall be held in the various States, and that it is necessary that we have action on the part of the various State legislatures before action can be taken by conventions in the respective States. That being the case, not only is it necessary to have the legislatures meet but the conventions can not be held until after the legislatures have met and provided the method and the means by which the conventions can be held. Therefore, instead of resulting in speed, it is going to result in delay.

There is one other thing that I think should be replied to, and that is that some of the States of the Union have a 4-year term for a State senator. That means that at least half of the senators of every State in the Union have been selected in the November election just past. Therefore, there is at least a reflection of half of even a State senate where it is said they have not been elected with reference to this proposal in the last election. I have not been able to find a single, solitary instance where a State legislature failed to reflect the sentiment of the State in passing upon a constitutional amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator was a member of the Republican convention in Chicago.

Mr. DICKINSON. I was.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator recollect any effort made there to strike out the provision calling for action by conventions rather than by legislatures?

Mr. DICKINSON. There was not. I was not a member of the resolutions committee; and when the resolution was brought in on the floor of the convention, there was only one substitute offered, and that was offered by the Senator from Connecticut. Let me suggest, however——

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say to the Senator that both the substitute offered by me and that proposed by the majority of the committee contained a provision for conventions, and in the resolutions committee no one appeared before us urging the adoption of any other method than that of ratification by conventions.

Mr. DICKINSON. I think that was probably due to the fact that the people thought they could get greater speed by adopting the convention system than by adopting the legislature system. I do not agree with that, and I do not think it is well founded. I think, also, that the convention system is involved with a lot of uncertainties and with a lot of conditions that may be questioned in the courts, and that the friends of the amendment here are going to involve the amendment in many complications that it will not be involved in if we will let it be submitted to the legislatures in the ordinary course.

If I had been a member of the resolutions committee, I should have proposed, and I know that in the negotiations leading up to the effort to formulate some proposals it was originally said that we would submit it to legislatures. It was changed. I do not know where the change took place, because I was not a member of the committee, and I knew nothing about their negotiations.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator yield there?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield further.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator has suggested that the only reason was the desire for speed. I did not hear that reason suggested in the committee. The reason suggested in the committee was that we were more likely to get an expression of the views of the people themselves through conventions than through legislatures chosen for other purposes.

Mr. DICKINSON. That is what I want to answer. Let me suggest this:

Suppose we had 30 States in the Union that had already ratified by convention. Suppose we had six where we still wanted to have conventions ratify. I am wondering what the pressure would be from the various organizations, both pro and con, in those respective States; the amount of funds that would be used; the advertising that would be paid for; the efforts that would be made to misdirect those States in the effort, if you please, to get or to defeat ratification by conventions.

In other words, it seems to me we are going back to the old system of how to control a convention; what will be used in order to control it; whether or not it will be possible, if you please, to hold a convention that can be clothed with the necessary legislative limitations to prevent the use of money and the challenge that the delegates were fraudulently elected; whether or not the charge will go not only to the local conventions but also to the State conventions. I think the ramifications there are far-reaching and that the friends of this amendment should think twice before they insist on voting for and adopting the convention system of ratification.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator include himself among the friends of repeal?

Mr. DICKINSON. I expect to vote for submission as required by the Republican platform, in so far as it can be worked out here, so that we will prevent the return of the saloon and preserve some Federal control over manufacture and transportation.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the Senator did not answer my question.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. Will not the Senator state his question again? I want to answer the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Senator consider himself as being among the friends of repeal?

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I am not among the friends of repeal.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what I wanted to hear the Senator say.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am not for direct repeal.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have not the floor.

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire of the Senator from Connecticut, referring to the Republican platform, whether or not he proposes to vote for section 3 of the pending joint resolution?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not. I propose to vote for the amendment to strike it out, and I have so stated, from the day after that on which the Republican platform was adopted.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, one further comment I want to make on the question of what attention was given to this particular phase of the question in the campaign. We heard a great deal about conventions and legislatures and various types of ratification prior to the time when we went to the convention. I think I know something about the sentiment that was developed during the campaign, and during the campaign I never heard the question asked or answered as to whether or not we were going to submit the question of repeal of the eighteenth amendment to conventions or to State legislatures.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. Is it not reasonable to assume that the opinions of everybody were pretty well known on that point? Both parties had agreed about how they should proceed, so the conclusion was, Why argue about it? Was not that the reason why there was no discussion of it during the campaign?

Mr. DICKINSON. If it was taken for granted that it was going to happen, I should think it would have been good advertising at least to have said to the country what we had pledged ourselves to do, and as to how we were going to do it. But I never heard the question discussed once in a single, solitary address during the entire campaign.

Mr. HEBERT. If the Senator will yield further, what advantage would there have been to either political party, since both were agreed on the proposition?

Mr. DICKINSON. We might have gathered in a few more of the stragglers. There seems to be some opposition here, and it comes from both sides of the Chamber. So undoubtedly there was no unanimous conclusion with reference to what was going to happen.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator's sympathies are not with those who wish to see repeal, so he probably is not familiar with the fact that some of the great organizations which have been working so hard to secure repeal have made it an essential part of their program to work for submission to conventions, and they made a very strong point of it, not only last year but the year before and the year before that. Therefore, when the question came before the committees on resolutions of the two conventions, they urged the adoption of a provision calling for submission to conventions, and when both political parties accepted the convention principle there was no further need, as the Senator from Rhode Island has said, of discussing it at all.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me further suggest that, since that has happened, and since the November 8 election, I am informed that even the friends of repeal have reached the conclusion that they would rather have the matter submitted to the legislatures, because they think the results of the recent election were so favorable to their cause that they do not want to run the chance of having conventions, and having the various State ratifications set aside or contested in court, and so forth.

Mr. BINGHAM. There the Senator from Iowa is speaking in behalf of the friends of repeal?

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BINGHAM. Although he admits himself he is not a friend of repeal.

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I am simply reflecting what I understand to be the attitude of the friends of repeal, since the results of the November 8 election are known, but I will say to the Senator that the results of the election on November 8 were not satisfactory to me at all anywhere along the line, even in Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think I can throw a little light on why the convention system was proposed in the Republican convention. For 18 months at least there had been considerable agitation over the question of whether the Republican platform should yield to the pressure to resubmit the eighteenth amendment to the people of the States. The argument was heard everywhere that at least there ought not to be a refusal to let the people vote on it if they wanted to, and the argument also was urged that if we voted to send the question back to the people, that would not necessarily commit anyone at the convention to vote a certain way when he went back to his State.

I recognize that while that argument has been used, it is not very forcible. The Constitution provides for two methods of amending the Constitution, and the convention method is one of them, and when I vote to send the matter to the people for ratification, if three-fourths of the Congress shall favor it, I see the inconsistency of saying that I am voting to let the people determine the question, and yet not showing my own conviction. I think that is an inconsistent position to take, although there is no doubt but that that is in the minds of a lot of people, who think that this is only a referendum; which I do not admit. That idea, however, rather prevailed in many sections.

Then this question arose, if the idea is to let the people vote on the question, it ought to be submitted in such a way that the vote by the people in the States should be recorded in a body selected specifically on that one issue, so that if a convention were called in Ohio to act upon the ratification of the proposal submitted, if the delegates were selected specifically with that one thing in view, we would come nearer to getting a cross section of the public opinion of the State than if the action were taken by the legislature. I recognize that there is force in that contention.

I agree with the Senator, however, that it would entail additional expense that is unnecessary; secondly, that the convention would have to be called by the same legislature that would likely pass upon the ratification, and we would be taking two bites when the thing might be settled in one.

I think I ought to say that that was the thing that was determining in suggesting the convention rather than the legislatures.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make a remark in connection with what the Senator from Ohio has just said?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator reminds me that during the debates on the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, it was repeatedly stated in Congress, so I have heard—I was not here at the time, being in France—I think by the Senator from Texas himself, by the Senator from Arizona, and other friends of the measure, that a vote for the resolution was not to be considered as a vote in favor of the amendment, but was to be considered as favoring a means of permitting the people to say whether they wanted the amendment adopted or not. I think that is correct.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will permit, that statement was often made. I was in the other House at the time, and it was made there very frequently. However, I did not think that was very forcible, because there are two methods by which the Constitution might be amended, and it is hardly consistent to say that when we vote for it here, we will not vote for it when we go back home.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I say to the Senator, on the question of legislatures and conventions, that I myself have given a great deal of thought to that matter, being desirous of getting the eighteenth amendment repealed at the earliest possible date, and with the least possible expense. But it has been brought to my attention that in many States the members of legislatures are elected year after year, and hold a kind of hereditary seat in the legislature, due to their ability, their representative character, and their distinction in their communities, that most of them have a record of having voted dry always, that it would be extremely difficult for them to change their votes, even to meet changed public opinion, that they would greatly regret doing it; but that a convention set up by the legislature in the same manner in which the legislature is chosen would consist of people who had not voted on the thing previously, and who would be free to vote as they believed their constituents wanted them to vote without regard to anything else. Therefore, I have finally come to the conclusion that the conventions of the great political parties were right in calling for the convention method, and that we would get a better expression of opinion with regard to the public thought in the States from conventions than we would from the legislatures.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to add one statement to what the Senator from Connecticut has just said?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. It seems clear to me that in the choice of delegates to a convention there would be but one issue involved, whether or not a candidate was for or against the amendment, and immediately the delegates had been chosen, every one in all the States would know what the fate of the amendment was to be in that State. That can seldom be true of the election of men to a legislature, because there are so many other issues involved. There are always local questions to be considered in the choice of representatives to a State legislature. Those issues would never arise in the choice of delegates to a convention to pass on a constitutional amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I want to reply to the Senator from Rhode Island before I yield further. I would rather trust a legislature that is selected in a campaign where there are discussed the various problems that confront the average State legislature, as a reflection of the cross-currents of a State on a moral issue like prohibition, than to have a group of men selected under the heat of a driving campaign, which might be the reflection of the sentiments of the State for the moment, during the heat of the campaign; but, after the matter had settled down and the people saw the result of their action, they might say, "Well, I admit that I was enthusiastic, but I was wrong." Therefore in the legislature we would have the reaction of the men who were not driven into their position by an intensive campaign, such as a convention would bring about. To me that would be the vicious result of submitting the matter to conventions.

Now I yield further to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that it seems to me that his remark would be true of an issue which had come up suddenly and had been discussed under pressure for a number of months. But it is my observation that when we are considering this issue, which has been before the American people now ever since 1918 or 1919, during which time we have seen distinguished clergymen, distinguished heads of universities, distinguished leaders of public opinion, change their views over from proprohibition to antiprohibition, there would not be the danger which the Senator fears of an intensive campaign, leading to an expression of public opinion not in conformity with the wishes of the people.

If I may add just one more word, with the permission of the Senator, he said a few moments ago that a convention, after it had been chosen, would be subject to tremendous pressure, perhaps money might be used to purchase delegates or to influence delegates. It seems to me, if the Senator will bear with me, that that is much more likely with a legislature than with a convention, chosen, as the Senator from Rhode Island has stated, where every candidate to the convention would be known to be either for repeal or against repeal. After a man was chosen he could not be bought away from it or he would lose all the respect of his community.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I wish I had as much faith in all convention delegates who are selected on a particular issue as the Senator from Connecticut has. But I have known delegates to change their minds, and they have been responsible delegates to responsible conventions.

I want to state further that my fear is not so much of what will happen after the delegates are chosen; my fear is of the type of advertising and the propaganda that will be put into the various localities in the selection of the delegates, the holding of the precinct caucuses, and the county conventions. That is where the things I have in mind will be brought to bear.

I want to suggest one thing further, that there is probably no subject that a public man is compelled to meet that has suffered as many attacks and defeats as has the prohibition question. We used to have the old system under which a town would go dry one year and go wet the next year.

I want to suggest that liquor has never known how to obey the law. It has never yet obeyed the law. I doubt if we will be any better off when we take such action as we are contemplating in this amendment. But there is a demand for resubmission and I would like to see it put in form so we can vote for a type of resubmission that I think safeguards the moral principles which are involved in the question.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] in almost the last sentence of his address upon the subject impressed upon us the importance of the Democratic and Republican platforms upon this subject. That is somewhat embarrassing to me. I like always, if it is possible for me to do so, to go along with my party platform. But when I am satisfied, as I am in this instance, that my party was wrong in writing such a provision into the platform, I can not bring myself to the point of following it merely because it is written there.

I have had advocates of straight repeal writing to me calling my attention to the fact that this is a part of the Republican platform. I think now I ought to call their attention to the fact that some Republican Senators here do not propose to follow the Republican platform upon this subject, notably, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who has stated frankly, and stated, he says, before the election, that he does not propose to follow the Republican platform with respect to the third section of the pending joint resolution. I know of no reason why I should be more closely bound by the provisions of the platform than my good Republican colleague from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Delaware was a member of the committee that wrote the platform in the form in which it was adopted, was he not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I was, and I made what I believe to be under normal conditions an effective argument before that committee upon the subject, but, like some Members of the Senate, the committee made up their minds before they heard the argument, and there was nothing I could do to persuade them.

After I left the committee I had the privilege of calling upon two men, both of whom are residents of my State, and both of whom have done more to steer the country to the point of having anything written in the platform with respect to the eighteenth amendment than any other men that I know. I went to them and argued with them as friends of repeal of the eighteenth amendment, the straight repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I begged of them not to urge upon the delegates, with what influence they had—and they had a lot—that we place any such provision in the platform. I called their attention to the fact that they were making two hurdles to jump where there was no necessity for jumping more than one.

I called their attention to the fact that it would be necessary, as has been stated several times to-day here, that we must first get action of the State legislature setting up the machinery for the convention. In order to get that done it would be necessary to pass an act of the legislature and get it approved by the governor, just like any other act of the legislature. On the other hand, if we submitted the resolution directly to the legislature itself, then we need not consult the governor at all. In that event all we would have to do would be to get a majority of the two Houses.

I made that argument to them and pointed out the difficulties that confronted them and then for the first time I discovered that there was in their minds the determination and the thought that all this could be arranged by the Congress and that there could be but one election on the same day all over the country upon this subject.

I can readily understand, with people having that idea in mind, that they would urge upon both national conventions the adoption of the convention method rather than the legislative method. It would be a very much simpler thing and those who believe that that could be done might very well advocate it. My own judgment is that on neither side, either in the Democratic convention or in the Republican convention, did those who were advocating this plan know exactly what they were doing with respect to it. From the very beginning they had had the idea that in order to get a vote of the people of the Nation upon the subject, in order to get a majority vote of the people of the Nation, we must have a convention method.

Years ago, before many people were interested in the question of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, they began associating the convention method with propaganda to repeal the eighteenth amendment. They started out having that idea in the beginning and having enlarged their views as they went along, they reached the national convention last summer with that idea in their minds without knowing the actual facts. I am saying that about two men who were largely responsible for the propaganda, neither of them knowing how it was to be done and both of them believing it was perfectly possible for Congress to make some provision with respect to it.

What they sought to do by the convention method was not only to get an individual opinion on this question from everybody, with nothing else on their minds, but they sought also to have a majority in the State control the convention in that State. In other words, here was a question to be propounded to the populace as a whole, to all those who could vote.

It was not intended by those persons and it is not even now intended by the persons advocating the convention method that there should be adopted the plan that is adopted in most States for selecting in various districts the members of the legislature. What they propose and what they hope to carry through is that the populace in the cities, most of which are wet, shall be arrayed against those in the country, most of whom are dry, and in order that they may get a majority of the wets on one side they propose that the subject shall be submitted in that form. Their purpose can not be accomplished in this way unless they control the legislature in the first instance, so that if they be able to control the legislature in the first place, why should they want any convention at all? Why should not they put their resolution through the legislature in the first instance?

In my own State, for instance, here is what happens. The city of Wilmington has half the population of the State. The city has one-half of the representatives in the legislature. If the legislature of my State begins to set up the machinery for a convention under this resolution, what will they do? If they want to make certain that the State goes wet they will submit it to the popular vote. If they want the State to remain dry, the chances are they will not submit it at all. If they do submit it, they will submit it under a plan so that the delegates will be selected from the individual legislative districts as now.

If I were as enthusiastic about the repeal of the eighteenth amendment as is the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], I should even then insist that my people and the people with whom I was advising are making a mistake in adopting the convention method, and that the quicker and more expeditious plan is the legislative method.

I may say to the Senator from Connecticut, and I say it to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] too, that as far as I am concerned, I do not feel that a vote upon this subject controls my vote in my State when I come to vote for delegates to the convention or to the legislature. When the people of my State have shown, as in my judgment they did show in the last election, that they want an opportunity to pass upon this question, then it is my duty, regardless of what I think about it, to give them that opportunity.

I go farther than that. I do not propose to be bound here by the Republican platform with respect to the matter. I propose to submit to my people as nearly the kind of resolution as I think ought to be submitted to them. But if I can not get that kind of a resolution adopted by the Congress, then I propose to vote for whatever is submitted in order that they may pass upon the question.

At the same time, when it comes to casting my individual vote in my State, it depends very much on the kind of resolution that is submitted as to whether I shall favor it or whether I shall not favor it. I warn those who are anxious that some modification be made of the eighteenth amendment, that they should not carry their convictions to the extreme and insist upon a clear clean-cut repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I agree with them that the situation has become such that something ought to be done. The eighteenth amendment ought to be modified in some form. But when they come to consider what the people of the country want, and remember that it must be approved by three-fourths of the States of the Nation, I warn them that in presenting to the people of the country a straight repeal and nothing but a repeal, with the possibility of the saloon returning in every State that is now wet, they are taking a great chance of arousing the sentiment of the people to the point where they may decline to modify the eighteenth amendment in any form.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has touched the very subject to which I meant to call attention a while ago, and that is the process of the amendment requiring two steps. The first one is in the Congress. The second one is in ratification by the States. It has been contended all over the country, including my own State, that a Congressman or a Senator can consistently vote for an amendment which requires a two-thirds vote in order that it be sent to the States, and at the same time let it be understood that he is not committing himself to the theory of the amendment, because he would not support it when it goes back to his State.

Does not the Senator have some embarrassment when he takes that position, that voting here in the Senate we are not committing ourselves back to the State on the ground that it is merely giving the people of the State a right to vote on the matter? Is that embarrassing to the Senator?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, it will take me but a moment to answer the Senator, but I shall gladly undertake to do so. I take it that when the Constitution provided that the Congress shall by two-thirds vote submit a proposed amendment to the Constitution it was intended that the Members of the Congress should themselves use some judgment of their own and not depend entirely upon the will of even a majority of the people of their own State.

In other words, the proposed amendment must be a reasonable proposition which a Senator or Member of the other House believes ought to be submitted to the people; but I do not at all agree that I can afford to stand here, when other Members of the Senate—it may be two-thirds of the Members of the Senate—maintain that a joint resolution proposing to amend the Federal Constitution should be submitted to the States of the Nation, and put my individual opinion against theirs, unless I should be satisfied that the people of my own State do not want to go to the trouble and go through the necessary procedure to pass upon the question. In other words, there is a combination of two considerations, first to use one's own judgment to determine whether there is such a sentiment of the people of the Nation as to make evident that they want the particular proposition submitted to them; and, second, to be satisfied that the people of one's own State want it submitted. Then, if those two conditions are met, it matters not at all what one's own individual opinion may be with respect to the proposed amendment, it becomes his duty to submit it so that the people of the Nation may pass upon it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator has answered my question, but he goes farther than I feel free to go. In other words, the second section of the joint resolution that is now before us is designed to permit the Federal authority to assist the States that want to be dry to remain dry. I am in favor of that. The third section is intended to give authority to the Federal Government to prevent the return of the saloon to the extent of regulating or prohibiting the drinking of liquor on the premises where the sale is made. I have offered an amendment to the effect that the authority proposed to be conferred on the Federal Government by the third section shall be enlarged, so that it shall not be limited simply to the regulation of the drinking where the sale is made but shall include any means that Congress may deem necessary to carry into effect the provision against the return of the saloon.

Now, here is the question: I could vote for the joint resolution, amended as I have suggested, not only on the ground that it proposes to give the people of the States the right to say whether or not they want to change the eighteenth amendment, for probably there is justification for doing that; but, as I now see it, I can not vote for straight repeal, because if I should do that it would mean to me utter chaos in the handling of this problem, and I would be doing a thing that my whole conscience would revolt against. I can not take the position the Senator has just announced, that it would not be imparting chaos into the handling of the liquor problem to vote for straight repeal and leave it simply to the people of the States to determine what they shall do. I can not go that far.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to say in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio that it seems to me the situation would be entirely different if the Republicans at the last election had succeeded in winning upon the kind of platform such as was submitted to them; but the truth is, unfortunately from my point of view, that the Democrats won, and in the Democratic platform there was the provision for the straight-out repeal.

The Democrats having won by such a huge majority, does not everyone feel justified, under circumstances like that, in submitting, if he has to, some proposal, even if it be a straight repeal? If we can not get what we want here, are we not bound to submit something to the people of the Nation who have spoken so loudly and so positively, assuming, if you please, that they were speaking upon that point as they were upon other pronouncements in the Democratic platform? If the Republicans had won I would not feel I could then vote for a straight-out repeal, and the only proposal I would be willing to submit to the people would be one embracing the substance of the promise contained in the Republican platform. I repeat, however, that is not the verdict of the people; the verdict of the people, so far as we know it upon this subject, is that they want a straight repeal.

If they insist upon Congress giving them a straight repeal, let us find out in the end whether or not there be three-fourths of the people of the various States of the Nation who agree with that. If they do, they will get what they want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BLAINE and Mr. ASHURST asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BRATTON. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ashurst | Clark | Hastings | Patterson |
| Austin | Connally | Hatfield | Pittman |
| Bailey | Costigan | Hayden | Robinson, Ark. |
| Bankhead | Couzens | Hebert | Robinson, Ind. |
| Barbour | Dale | Kean | Russell |
| Barkley | Davis | Keyes | Schuyler |
| Bingham | Dickinson | King | Sheppard |
| Black | Dill | La Follette | Shortridge |
| Blaine | Fess | Lewis | Smith |
| Borah | Frazier | Logan | Steiwer |
| Bratton | George | McGill | Stephens |
| Brookhart | Glass | McKellar | Trammell |
| Bulkley | Goldsborough | McNary | Vandenberg |
| Byrnes | Gore | Neely | Wagner |
| Capper | Hale | Norris | Walcott |
| Caraway | Harrison | Nye | White |

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the committee amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas offers the following amendment to the committee amendment: On page 3, line 2, strike out the words "the legislatures of," and insert the words "conventions in," and on page 3 line 16, strike out the words "the legislatures of" and insert the words "conventions in."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], who is absent on official business of the Senate. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. FESS's name was called). The present occupant of the chair has a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on business of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON].

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM (when Mr. METCALF's name was called). The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea,"

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. If he were present, he would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when the name of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was called). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF.]

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STEPHENS. On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (after having voted in the negative). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I am unable to get a transfer, so I shall have to withdraw my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote in the negative, and the Senator from Florida would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. That Senator has not voted. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MCKELLAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. It seems that he has not voted. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] is paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If present, the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea," and the Senator from Montana would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

I have also been requested to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], if present, would vote "nay." He is unavoidably absent.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 15, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which is at the clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is, on page 3, to strike out section numbered 2, being lines 7, 8, 9, and 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, this is the question of striking out section 2, which provides for the protection of the so-called dry States. I should like to be heard on that amendment.

I look upon this provision of the amendment as vital. It does not seem to me that we can afford to strip the amendment of all effort to protect the dry States. Indeed, if I understand the two platforms, that is a part of the pledge of the platforms. While perhaps that is not controlling, it has been emphasized to-day to a considerable extent, and perhaps some would feel that they should be bound by it. I do not cite it, however, as binding myself.

Mr. President, it has been said that the Webb-Kenyon Act is a sufficient protection to the dry States. The Webb-Kenyon Act was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States by a divided court. The President of the United States—President Taft, who was afterwards Chief Justice—vetoed it on the ground that it was unconstitutional. The Attorney General of the United States rendered an opinion to the effect that it was unconstitutional. Elihu Root, when in the Senate, argued that it was unconstitutional. Mr. Justice Sutherland, who is now upon the Supreme Bench, argued before the Senate that it was unconstitutional. Therefore, Mr. President, we are turning the dry States over for protection to a law which is still of doubtful constitutionality and which, as it was upheld by a divided court, might very well be held unconstitutional upon a re-presentation of it. Secondly, we are asking the dry States to rely upon the Congress of the United States to maintain indefinitely the Webb-Kenyon law.

It will be recalled that at the time the decision of the Supreme Court was made with reference to the Webb-Kenyon Act immediately thereafter there began a campaign upon the part of those interested in the liquor traffic to secure one of two things—either a repeal of the Webb-Kenyon Act by act of Congress or a reconsideration in the court. Thus, at the time of the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, that was an unsettled problem. It had not become, and never has become—except in the sense that now, since the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, it has not been contested as it otherwise would have been—it never has become a settled policy of the Government or a settled policy of the Congress and, it seems to me, could not be accepted as a sufficient protection to the dry States.

Mr. President, I want to go back a little in the discussion of this matter to the history of the fight of the dry States to remain dry and be protected.

We hear a great deal in these days about the eighteenth amendment destroying the police powers of the States. I venture to say that anyone who has taken the trouble to familiarize himself with the destruction of the police powers of the States relative to the liquor question will have to conclude that the police powers had been destroyed prior to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment, taken away from the States prior to that time through the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the constant and persistent attack of the liquor interests upon the rights of the States to be dry and to exercise their police powers to the end that they might be dry.

In 1847 there came before the Supreme Court for the first time the question of the right of the States, in the exercise of their police power, to control the sale of intoxicating liquor.

I want Senators to bear in mind that for 75 years the States sought in every possible way to preserve the right to control the liquor interests within their respective borders, and I venture to say that had they been able to do so, the eighteenth amendment would never have been heard of.

The principle of local self-government is justly popular with the American people. It is interwoven with the memories which go back to the days when the great tenets of free government were being first tested in the wilderness of America. The New England town meeting and the burgesses of Virginia were the universities from which graduated a body of men who, in vision and courage, in dignity and poise, in constructive leadership, have never been excelled in the formative period of any nation. In these early gatherings where all questions of public concern were considered and debated, the people acquired an interest in public affairs, a vigilance for the public good, which enabled them to meet with rare judgment the great responsibilities placed upon them after a successful revolution.

When our fathers met to frame the Constitution, they guarded with conscientious care this right of local self-government. Local government for local affairs, a National Government for national affairs, was the great rule among those to whom was entrusted the making of our national charter. They adhered to it with unbroken fidelity and with an unwavering consistency.

It will be a sad day for this Republic when that principle is forgotten or ignored in the administration of this Government. I believe in this principle. I want to see it preserved.

The advocates of repeal insist that they are seeking to reestablish local self-government, State rights, in the matter of the control of intoxicating liquors. What I wish to say is that we have never had local self-government and State rights in reference to the liquor traffic except for a short time. The most persistent and successful opponents of these great principles have been those engaged in the liquor business. They disregarded the most fundamental principles of State rights and local self-government. Long before the eighteenth amendment was adopted they had practically destroyed or rendered futile these principles. If, therefore, local self-government or State rights are to be restored as to the problem now before us, we must do something more than repeal the eighteenth amendment. To repeal the eighteenth amendment and nothing more would be to leave these vital principles of government to become the plaything of the liquor traffic.

I want at this time to recall to you the long fight, the unsuccessful fight, which the temperance and prohibition people made for the preservation of local self-government, of State rights, as to the control of intoxicating liquors. I want to recall how in every conceivable way some of those engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors sought to break down and destroy these principles and to rob the people in their respective States of their protection. I have seen the laws of the dry States thwarted and defied, the policies adopted by the people trampled upon and disregarded by the same interests which now plead for State rights and for the right of every community to have its own policy with reference to intoxicating liquor. I have seen saloons in wet States established within 10 feet of the State line of dry States. A living conspiracy financed and supported by interests outside of the dry States violated, evaded, and nullified the laws within the dry States. We had no appeal from that source at that time for State rights. We had no well-financed association seeking to uphold the rights of the citizen and to bring about respect for the policies of the States.

I want first to refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in 1847 in what were known as the License cases. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, I believe it was—I know New Hampshire and Massachusetts—had passed what they called license laws, that is to say, laws that provided that no one could engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors within those States who had not secured a license and complied with certain terms and conditions under the statute. The case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, when Chief Justice Taney was presiding over the court, and the Chief Justice wrote the leading opinion in the case. He took the position that while a shipment of liquor into a State came within the purview of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and therefore would ordinarily be under the control of the National Government, nevertheless, when the Congress had not acted, when it had not assumed to control the matter, it was within the power of the State, in the exercise of its police powers, to control the sale of intoxicating liquors. Therefore, Chief Justice Taney, in the main opinion, upheld the licensing laws of the States involved on the theory that the police powers of the States should remain in force and effect unless Congress had actually taken charge of the subject and legislated upon it.

Mr. President, that remained the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1847 to 1888. During that time the States began to build up pretty general control of the liquor traffic under the decision of the Supreme Court. But as the States began to take control and limit the power of the liquor interests in shipping liquor into the States, and more and more States came to adopt measures of that kind, the contest was renewed in the Supreme Court of the United States, and those engaged in the liquor traffic again sought the decision of the court upon that question. While it is not directly on the point, I will ask Senators to bear in mind that for that length of time the Supreme Court of the United States sustained the Taney decision, which makes me rather uneasy about leaving the Webb-Kenyon Act to the protection of the Supreme Court of the United States, because in 1888 they wiped out the Taney decision and established a new doctrine.

In 1886 the State of Iowa passed a law not permitting common carriers to bring intoxicating liquors into the State without first being furnished with a certificate that the consignee was authorized to sell intoxicating liquors in the county where the liquors were going. The law would have been valid under the Taney decision, because Congress had never legislated upon the subject, and Iowa was exercising the power which had been allowed to New Hampshire and other States under the Taney decision. But the Supreme Court undertook to distinguish—it seldom overrules, it generally distinguishes—between the two cases; that is, the case which was before it and the Taney decision. At any rate, this decision in the case of Bowman v. Railway Company (125 U. S.), was the first step toward the doctrine that when Congress has failed to legislate touching a matter of interstate commerce, it is presumed that Congress intends the matter to remain free and uncontrolled by legislation.

It was conceded that Congress had not legislated; the State had legislated, the State was seeking in the exercise of its police powers to control that which was inimical to its health, to its peace, and to its proper development, all of which was conceded by the court.

The court said that the Congress had not acted; but, notwithstanding the fact that it had not legislated, it must be presumed that Congress wanted the matter to remain without any legislation. This situation: Congress did not act, did not legislate; the State could not act, could not legislate, and the liquor traffic was free and uncontrolled by either Congress or the State. That was the result of the decision in the Bowman case.

Those engaged in the liquor business were not satisfied with the decision. All the time those who are now asking us to turn back to the States the control of the liquor traffic were seeking to break down the power of the States to control the liquor traffic.

The State of Iowa passed a prohibition law prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, except under certain specifications made. The Supreme Court in the case of Leisy v. Harding (135 U. S. 100) held the law unconstitutional, in so far as it applied to the sale by the importer in the original package or keg. The Supreme Court took up the License cases, and finally and specifically overruled the Taney decision, or distinguished it to such an extent that there was nothing left of it.

The States therefore were powerless to protect themselves against the importation of liquor into the States. There never was any real chance for the dry States to enforce their laws after the decision which was made in the case of Leisy against Harding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In so far as I am concerned, I shall modify the amendment I have offered and ask a vote to strike out section 3. I shall not insist on a vote to strike out section 2, which contains the following language:

> The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

I shall modify the amendment in that particular.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, then I shall not occupy the time of the Senate except for about 5 or 10 minutes to explain the contention which I was making.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will it not be a fact, however—if I may address myself to the Senator from Arkansas—that he will subsequently offer the straight repeal substitute, which will leave as the only issue before the Senate whether or not the particular section to which the Senator from Idaho addresses himself shall remain?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; my idea now is that I will modify my amendment so as to require a vote on striking out section 3, which is the provision giving Congress concurrent power to "regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold," leaving section 2 in the joint resolution. That will simplify the controversy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator understand that there is anyone else who will offer the amendment? Is the Senator from New York intending to offer the amendment?

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from New York is in accord with the suggestion I have made, and all Senators on this side with whom I have had opportunity of discussing it at all are in accord with my proposed modification of the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the motion is to strike out section 2. The Senator ought to withdraw his motion, then.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the amendment is in the nature of a substitute for the entire resolution. But I will modify the motion, so that it will be a motion to strike out section 3. That will make it very simple.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, then I shall take but a few minutes more.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. In view of the inquiry made, I may say to the Senator that I have made a study of the history of these decisions to which he has been referring, and it is on account of those decisions, so far as I am concerned, that if the dry States want additional assurance that they will be protected I shall have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I had that thought myself. I do not wish to ask the Senate to put itself in the position of denying any measure of protection to dry territory.

Mr. BORAH. Very well, Mr. President, then I will conclude in a few minutes. I simply want to round out the particular case about which I was talking.

All the cases I have cited—the Bowman case, the Leisy-Hardin case, and other cases—were decided by a divided court.

In the Bowman case this language is found in the dissenting opinion:

If, as the court now decides, the Constitution gives the right to transport intoxicating liquors into Iowa from another State, and if that right carries with it as one of its essential ingredients authority in the consignee to sell or exchange such articles after they are brought in and while in his possession in the original packages, it is manifest that the regulations forbidding sales of intoxicating liquors within the State for other than medicinal, mechanical, culinary, or sacramental purposes * * * will be of little practical value.

Again, in the dissenting opinion, it is said:

Suppose the people of a State believe upon reasonable grounds that the general use of intoxicating liquors is dangerous to the public peace, the public health, and the public morals, what authority has Congress or the judiciary to review their judgment upon that subject and compel them to submit to a condition of things which they regard as destructive of their happiness and the peace and good order of society?

In the dissenting opinion in the Leisy case we find the following language:

Call them [the laws] by whatever name. If they are necessary to the well-being and independence of all communities, they remain among the reserved rights of the States, no expressed grant of them to the General Government having been either proper or apparently embraced in the Constitution.

Again the court says:

Without attempting to define what are the peculiar subjects or limits of this power [the police power], it may safely be affirmed that every law for the restraint and punishment of crime for the preservation of the public peace, health, and morals must come within this category.

Again:

The police power, which is exclusively in the States, is alone competent to the correction of these great evils and all measures of restraint or prohibition necessary to effect the purpose are within the scope of that authority.

Mr. President, I wanted to say that this question of the right of the States, in the exercise of the police powers, to control the liquor traffic within the States, was fairly and squarely presented in many cases to the Supreme Court, always a portion of the court contending that the police powers should be permitted to be exercised by the States to the full extent within the boundaries of the States.

I venture the opinion, and it is my belief, that the eighteenth amendment would never have been adopted had it not been for the open, brazen, corrupt, persistent defiance of the laws of the dry States by the liquor interests outside those States. At the time the eighteenth amendment was adopted, 33 States had prohibition in some form. The people had declared they wanted to be rid of this evil, or at least to control it in their own way. These States were invaded, their laws broken, their officials corrupted, by the same influences which now plead for States rights and local control. They did not at that time respect that right at all. They trampled upon it and scoffed at it. Therefore, if we are to have what we are now promised, local self-government, State rights, the right of the people of the respective States to adopt and enjoy their own policies, we must have some other method, some other provisions of the Constitution, than those which existed prior to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

All this was sought to be remedied by the Webb-Kenyon Act, and I am very glad indeed the able Senator from Arkansas has seen fit to recognize the justice and fairness to the States of incorporating it permanently in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask my able friend from Idaho a question? The Senator from Idaho has no doubt, has he, that it is both within the power and the propriety of Congress to enact a law that will make it a crime for what we call the wet States, or those living in one, to ship or send any intoxicating liquor across the border into a dry State?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt, if the amendment is adopted, that it will be within the power of Congress, as well as within the power of the State, to punish those who ship liquor into a dry State.

Mr. LEWIS. Such is my contention. I have been insisting upon such enactment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] proposes, on page 3, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. Congress shall have concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ashurst | Costigan | Hull | Robinson, Ind. |
| Bailey | Couzens | Johnson | Russell |
| Bankhead | Dale | Kean | Schuyler |
| Barbour | Davis | Kendrick | Sheppard |

| Byrnes | Harrison | Norris | Walcott |
| Capper | Hastings | Nye | Walsh, Mass. |
| Caraway | Hatfield | Patterson | White |
| Clark | Hayden | Pittman | |
| Connally | Hebert | Robinson, Ark. | |

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is the amendment upon which I reserved freedom of action. It will seem strange to some that I should have any hesitancy about this provision of the Constitution as I am so pronouncedly against the return of the saloon. But I do not believe that this will prevent the return of the saloon. I think it will prove wholly delusive. I am quite clear in my own mind that once we legalize the sale of intoxicating liquors and turn them back to the States, as a practical proposition the Federal Government can not possibly supervise how they shall be drunk.

For instance, it is claimed that at the present time we can not execute the eighteenth amendment, although it is illegal to sell liquor. Now we propose to make it legal to sell the liquor and propose at the same time to step in as a practical proposition and designate where that which is legally sold shall be consumed. As a practical proposition I do not believe it is possible to do it.

The second proposal to which I invite attention is this: When we come to execute this provision we will be executing it against the States, not like we do the eighteenth amendment against individuals. A State will designate the manner in which liquor may be sold. It may adopt the license system or it may adopt the saloon system. The Federal Government will be in the attitude of calling a State to the bar of public opinion and asking it to readjust its laws, to reenact its laws, to reestablish its system. The State will really be on trial before the National Government—not the individual, but the State itself which is backing the system and has the right to do so under the proposed amendment. The State has a perfect right to adopt the system, and if we undertake to say that the National Government shall step in as a sovereign against the second sovereign and control its system, in my opinion, it will prove utterly impractical.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator think that under section 3 a State could do anything which the Congress had prohibited?

Mr. BORAH. But it does not prohibit it.

Mr. HASTINGS. My understanding of section 3 is that, giving Congress concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold, it would leave the Congress in a position to enact a law which it would be illegal for the State to exceed. That is my understanding of it.

I think it has the additional advantage that all the Congress would have to do would be to enact the necessary law regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold and, Congress having done that, it would not be possible for the State to legalize any person to sell contrary to the provisions of the Federal law.

Mr. BORAH. On the other hand, suppose the State adopts a system and enacts a law which permits liquor to be drunk on the premises where sold?

Mr. HASTINGS. My own theory about it is that if Congress enacted a different law, the State provision would thereby become illegal.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I said, that we will have two sovereignties contending against each other as to the method in which liquor shall be drunk. Does the Senator think that is a practical proposition?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do think it is practical. I think Congress might enact a law stating what might be done in the way of selling liquor to be drunk on the premises, and then, immediately that Congress had enacted such a law, it would be necessary for the State to limit its own laws in that particular.

Mr. BORAH. How could we compel a State to modify its law? Would the mere fact of passing an act of Congress strike down the State law?

Mr. HASTINGS. Instantly the Congress enacted the law upon the subject and laid down the rule or prohibited the act from being done, any citizen at any time could by some civil action prevent another citizen from acting under some authority that came from the State. That is my own notion about the way it would operate.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the National Government could act in a judicial capacity and strike down a law passed by a sovereign State and which it had a right to pass. The Senator will concede that in the first instance the State would have a perfect right to license a saloon.

Mr. HASTINGS. The State would not have any such right if the Congress by some act had prohibited it.

Mr. BORAH. But suppose the Congress has not acted?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, I agree to that. Unless the Congress acts this section does not become effective at all, but when the Congress does act, then the State may not exceed the powers given under the Federal act.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that unless we put into the amendment a specific statement to the effect that liquor shall not be drunk upon the premises where sold and make that prohibitive in the Constitution, we are going to get into all kinds of difficulties and troubles. And even then as a practical proposition it seems to me it would be impossible of successful enforcement. Now, above all things I do not want to deceive or mislead in writing a constitution. I feel if I should vote for this I would be doing an insincere thing and that about the fundamental law.

Mr. HASTINGS and Mr. BLACK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not want to take the Senator's time, but in view of the condition about which complaint is constantly being made, namely, that Federal appointees are going into the States and enforcing the police power there, and so forth, which is so objectionable from the viewpoint of many States and many persons in those States, my own thought was that that was not involved in this section at all.

Mr. BORAH. When the Congress passes a law how is it going to be enforced unless Federal agents are sent into the States to enforce it?

Mr. HASTINGS. If I were operating under section 3 of this resolution, I would not have Congress pass any law which had any penalty attached at all to it but I would rely upon the fact that that law is supreme; that the States cannot exceed it; and therefore some civil action may be taken against any person operating under State authority and selling liquor in violation of congressional authority.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if offenders are not deterred by criminal action, how could we expect them to be deterred by an inane civil action?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me to answer the question, I will say that I assume that no State anywhere would pass a law after Congress had acted under this section and had said that it shall be unlawful to do this in any State in the Union. I assume that the members of the legislatures of the States of the Union who at the same time they take an oath to support the constitution of their own States also take an oath to support the Constitution and laws of the Federal Government would not permit any act to be passed by their own legislatures in violation of the provisions of the congressional act.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator from Alabama in just a moment. The able Senator from Delaware is answered by the long experience which we have had under the eighteenth amendment. Each member of the legislature of every State in the Union has taken an oath since the eighteenth amendment has been adopted to support and maintain the Constitution of the United States. To support and maintain the Constitution of the United States, in the language of Abraham Lincoln, means the enactment of such laws as are necessary to maintain and enforce the Constitution of the United States; and yet the States, one after another, through their legislatures, have repealed all laws which enabled them to maintain and enforce the Constitution of the United States, and the members of those legislatures did not seem to think that they were violating their oaths in doing it. I think they did.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think that is a pretty complete answer to my suggestion.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he agrees with the viewpoint of the Senator from Delaware that under this clause the law passed by Congress would control and be over the law passed by the State? As I understand, the Senator from Delaware takes the position—and I think it is correct—that if two jurisdictions or two sovereignties each pass a law, one of them, of course, has to be supreme. Does the Senator agree that that would be the Federal law?

Mr. BORAH. Do I agree to it?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; which would be supreme?

Mr. BORAH. Well, I am very frank to say that where two sovereign powers have the right to enact laws, and both of them have a perfect right to do so, it would be very difficult for me to know which one was supreme as the question would be presented here.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And it would result in great confusion.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I should like to ask the Senator one other question, if he will permit me. That being true, suppose Congress should pass a law restricting and regulating, to a certain extent, the sale of liquor in Delaware or Idaho, and then suppose the State of Idaho or Delaware wanted to impose greater restrictions; they did not want liquor sold in their State in the manner prescribed by Congress; under which law could the citizen operate? Would he operate under the Federal law or under the State law?

Mr. BORAH. Well, excuse me——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just one word more, and I will conclude.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be pardoned for saying to the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Alabama that I had before me a few months ago, among other decisions, a decision of the Supreme Court of Connecticut which passed upon that question, and it was held that where a local law was in conflict with a Federal law and the subject matter was the same the Federal law became supreme, and the court gave it precedence.

Mr. BORAH. There is no doubt about that as a general proposition; but where a State gets its authority to pass a law from the Constitution of the United States, from the same source that the Congress gets its authority, and both of them are sovereign within their territory, I do not see how it can be said that one is supreme over the other.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator from Idaho will yield for one further question, assuming that the Federal Government should pass a regulatory law which was not prohibitive, whereas a State wanted a prohibitive law; if the law is as stated by the Senator from Illinois, the Federal law would prevail, and, of course the prohibitive law of the State could be stricken down. Therefore, instead of that State having a law prohibiting the sale of liquor within its borders, Congress would pass a law which would coerce the State into permitting the sale of liquor under regulations laid down by the Federal statute.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word more and I shall conclude.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. GORE. I do. I will first say that I appreciate the difficulties which the Senator is pointing out, and I want to ask him if the situation might not be clarified and those difficulties obviated if we should strike out section 3 and substitute language something like this—

> That no State shall authorize or permit the retail sale for private profit of distilled spirits for beverage purposes.

Certainly that would obviate the conflict of the sovereignties. The gravamen of this trouble lies in the sale of distilled spirits for private profit. Such a provision would prohibit that being done, and then the States could sell liquor through some State organization as is done in Canada or in Scandinavian countries. It would remove the clashing of sovereignties and would eradicate the chief difficulty and trouble about the liquor business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have spent some time during the last 18 months trying to determine how the National Government may control the consumption of liquor within the States after we shall repeal the eighteenth amendment. It is my judgment, and that is the reason why I am voting as I do both against the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and against this section—that when we shall have legalized the sale of intoxicating liquor and turned it back to the States there will be no power that can, as a practical proposition, prevent the return of the saloon except the people within the respective States. In dealing with the Constitution of the United States I do not want to vote for a clause in that Constitution which, while not so intended by those who are advocating it, I believe will be deceptive; and for that reason I shall vote against it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, I should like to remove a false impression which I think the Senator from Idaho has perhaps created as to the legislative action of the State of Illinois concerning some of its local legislation. As he is a distinguished son of that glorious State which I have the honor to represent in part, I desire to say to him that the legislation which was repealed was known as the search and seizure act, under which law human beings could be seized and searched, and if the search disclosed liquor in any form upon that basis alone the individual could be convicted. That is the law that was repealed and wiped out.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is in error. I did not mention the State of Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I thought the Senator said the State of Lincoln.

Mr. BORAH. I referred to what Lincoln said as to what constituted maintaining the Constitution, to wit, the passage of laws which were essential to its enforcement.

Mr. LEWIS. My correction was unnecessary; I misinterpreted the Senator's language.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, since the State of Illinois has been cleared of any wrongdoing, I want to offer a few remarks regarding this proposed amendment. To my mind the amendment in its operation will present no difficulty whatever.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like at some time before the Senator concludes his remarks—and I am making this suggestion now so as not to interrupt him again—to consider the advisability of striking out the word "concurrent."

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to make that suggestion if there was any doubt in anybody's mind.

Mr. President, I do not agree for a moment with those Senators, for whose judgment I have the highest respect, that this provision if retained in the proposed amendment will get us into any difficulty whatever. I refer to section 3. Suppose we leave it in and it goes in the Constitution of the United States. Let us assume that the Congress passes a law under this section prohibiting the sale of liquor to be drunk upon the premises where sold and fixing a penalty for its violation. Then let us assume that a State passes a law, or had passed one before Congress enacted a law on the subject, providing for the saloon, the old kind of a saloon, and suppose some individual for the violation of the act of Congress is indicted in the Federal court and brought to trial. He is indicted for the violation of a law passed by Congress, based upon a specific provision of the Constitution of the United States, and he offers in defense that he is operating his saloon under a State statute. Would any one claim that such a contention would be a defense? Would any court even permit him to offer that in evidence?

In the first place the law is plain; it has been passed by Congress; Congress has a right to pass it; it is admitted to be based upon this provision of the Constitution, and no one claiming a right to violate that law can offer it as a defense, unless he can show he is acting under a law that comes from some authority higher than Congress; and I take it that would be an impossibility, because Congress is operating under the Constitution of the United States; it has passed a law that the Constitution specifically permits it to pass and it would not make any difference, so far as that law is concerned, so far as the trial of the offender is concerned, that the State has passed a different law or has passed any law whatever. It would not be any defense. The only question involved in that case would be, Is the law under which the defendant was indicted a constitutional law? Did Congress have authority to enact it? Here it is in black and white. It seems to me it is as plain as anything can possibly be.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask my friend this question: A man is brought into court for violating the act of Congress. The prosecution must establish his criminal intent; and he presents, in defense of his intent, the authorization of his sovereign State. Now, in the last analysis the court might hold that the authority of Congress was supreme; but, in my opinion, the jury would take into consideration the fact that this man was acting by authority of his State.

Mr. NORRIS. In the first place, he would never get it in evidence. The first thing that would happen when he offered his State license would be an objection on the part of the prosecutor, and that objection undoubtedly would be sustained without any hesitancy. He never would get it in evidence. The jury never would have an opportunity to consider it. He has violated a Federal statute. The authority of Congress to pass the Federal statute stands unquestioned, because it is based upon the specific language of the Constitution; and unless he could show some defense under the Federal law there would not be anything to do but to find him guilty.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Furthermore, the court unquestionably would instruct the jury to disregard the evidence if it did get in.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it would.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can not see how it would be possible to deprive the man of the evidence which would nullify the charge of criminal intent on his part.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, but, Mr. President, in a statutory offense you would not have to prove intent. The violation of law is sufficient to show his criminal intent. Every man is conclusively presumed to know what the law is. To show, for instance, that he had told somebody that he intended to violate the law, or something of that kind, while proper evidence, would never be necessary in the violation of a Federal statute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As a matter of fact, it is not evidence at all. That would be no evidence, as a matter of fact. The question is whether or not he violated the statute. That is the only question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, permit me to say—and then I will not interrupt again—that the books are full of cases where statutes, although afterward declared void, were permitted to be introduced as reflecting upon the intent of the party charged with the commission of crime.

Mr. NORRIS. I will venture to assert that the Senator can not find any case anywhere in the history of jurisprudence that would apply to a case coming under a constitutional provision like this, passed by a legislature acknowledged to have authority to do it.

Mr. BORAH. If we can get an adjournment of this amendment until to-morrow morning, I feel I will be able to bring them in.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I should like to have the Senator bring them in.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Nebraska let me tell him a bit of history in Illinois?

The firm of Grommes & Ulrich, very large importers, and for years a very well-established institution, a large retail house, decided to dissolve and go out of business. It proceeded to avail itself of the statute of the State of Illinois which allowed it to dissolve and dispose of its goods. It, therefore, sir, disposed of its whiskies, wines, champagnes, and so forth, by disposing of them in gifts and sales to many establishments all around the city.

The members of the firm were indicted for conspiracy to violate the Federal laws on prohibition. The case was tried before Mr. Justice Evans, of the Wisconsin circuit, but sitting in the circuit court of appeals at Chicago. The statute of Illinois allowed the concern to dissolve itself and to dispose of whatever it possessed, whether it be wood or ironware or silver or what not, and the question was whether the members of the firm could be convicted for carrying out the law of Illinois which gave them authority to do what they did, because it also ran counter to the law of Congress passed subsequently.

That was the issue out in that State in a trial which lasted, I think, for a couple of months; but, as the Senator has correctly stated, right there arose the very complication to which he has made reference. Finally the sitting judge, with another Federal judge sitting with him, decided that the question should go to the jury to pass upon the good faith and honest intent of the defendants; whether they really meant merely to comply with their home law and incidentally violated the Federal law, or whether they were merely seeking to evade the Federal law by their action. But the complication and the confusion did exist in the exact manner our eminent friend from Nebraska has described.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. May I suggest that the question of criminal intent, unless it is made a specific ingredient of a statutory crime, is never any more than the mere intent to do the thing which the statute forbids.

Mr. NORRIS. To do the thing that constituted the violation of the statute.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for that. There is not any question about that being good law.

Mr. President, let me say in conclusion that if this amendment goes into the Constitution, and we do not want the return of the saloon, here is the only hope of preventing it. Strike it out and the saloon comes back. There is no way to prevent it. There can be saloons all around, in every State in the Union, if the States provide for it, and Congress is helpless.

We have been discussing prohibition for years. I have been, I think, at least in my own mind, fair enough to admit that in my judgment prohibition was a failure; and I have expressed a willingness to help to modify, if I can, the Volstead Act in order that we may see whether it is true, as Senators and other people everywhere have been proclaiming for years, "If you will give us beer and light wines we will all be happy, and there will be no more drunkenness, and it will result in a better morality, a more complete temperance life of our people, a better enforcement of prohibition, and the banishment of the bootlegger and the speak-easy." I have made up my mind, prohibitionist as I have been nearly all my life, that since it seemed that prohibition enforcement was falling down, we had better try that experiment; and I have, in the committee, voted in favor of reporting that kind of a bill that is now on the calendar of the Senate. I should like to see it enacted into law. I do not want to put this country back to the days when the saloons were rampant. I want to avoid it if I can.

If we adopt this amendment, and it becomes operative with section 3 out of it, there is nothing to prevent the return of the saloon. It is the only hope. If those of you who said, "The prohibition amendment is wrong, but the saloon is wrong, too, and if you will repeal the prohibition amendment we will help you to provide for laws that will prevent the return of the saloon," meant what you said, then it seems to me you ought to keep this provision in this amendment, because it is the only hope.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I infer from what the Senator has so ably said that he is of the opinion that the majority of the States and the public are opposed to the saloon and to the speak-easy, and that the only chance of removing the present evil, which is now the speak-easy—the former evil being the saloon—is by a proposal of handling the liquor question in some other way than it is being handled now, or was handled through the saloon. Do I correctly interpret the Senator's views?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is right. That is what I believe.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And does not the Senator think that a proposition that prevents any State from reestablishing the saloon is the only likely one that will receive the support of 36 States?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I think that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Senators and all the other people who have been advocating the repeal of prohibition have been promising the public that they would see to it that the saloon did not come back. Here is the avenue through which the saloon is coming back, or the avenue through which it is going to be prevented from coming back.

I believe I am fair in giving to the Senate what I think was the judgment of the Judiciary Committee on this matter. We did not believe that as a practical proposition it would perhaps be necessary for Congress to legislate on the subject. We believed that if this section were left in here, knowing that Congress had the right to legislate on the subject, a State would hesitate before it passed a law that would permit the saloon to come back, knowing that at any time there would exist the power in Congress to legislate on that subject and prevent the saloon from coming back.

As I look at it, there is no doubt whatever but that there would be no difficulty in the enforcement of the law—not anything like the difficulty that was presented to us in the enforcement of the prohibition amendment that we have had for the last 10 or 12 years. It would be easy of enforcement, because, in the first place, there is a sentiment in the country—I think, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, a strong, almost a unanimous sentiment, on the part of all classes of people—that they do not want the saloon to come back. If we strike this out, it may be possible that it will come back. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] said he thought that in his State they would not legislate the saloon back; but, if they do not, they need not fear this law.

It seems to me, therefore, that if the States are going to do what Senators who are advocating the striking out of this amendment claim and believe, this law can not hurt them a particle. Congress will never undertake to legislate on the subject if the States themselves prevent the return of the saloon.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am opposed to striking out section 3.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this question. We have listened for several hours to speeches, and I am ready to vote.

My views are so concisely and clearly stated in one of many letters that have come to me, and in some newspaper editorials, that I am going to ask that they be inserted in the RECORD at this juncture of the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WORCESTER, MASS., January 30, 1933.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I have been asked to write you concerning the resolution on the eighteenth amendment now pending before the United States Senate. I do not think my opinions are of much value, but, as a constituent and as one who has invariably voted for you whenever you were a candidate for the Senate, I might perhaps trespass on your time sufficiently to have my little say.

I have always done what I could against prohibition from the start. I have always desired the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I have not taken my part in the battle against prohibition solely for the sake of legalized beverages. I have always believed that the eighteenth amendment was a terrible mistake because it burdened the Federal Government with the responsibility of using police powers which ought to be used by the local authorities. I have always believed that this method hampered the Federal Government with responsibilities that did not belong to it and has been mainly responsible for the crime and corruption into which we have been plunged.

The repeal resolution which is now before the Senate would, if put into effect, still continue this state of affairs. In other words, some of the worst features of national prohibition would be retained under the proposed amendment as brought before the Senate. The Federal Government would still have on its hands a department for national enforcement which the taxpayers would have to provide for, and which would continue as a menace to national well being and national freedom, and would also, I am afraid, continue as a breeding ground for all sorts and kinds of corruption.

That, to speak frankly, seems to me the most objectionable feature of the resolution. The second feature is the fact that the resolution would be referred for ratification to State legislatures and not to conventions, which was promised in the platform of the Democratic Party when Governor Roosevelt was nominated. I see no reason whatever why the principle of State conventions should be ignored in the Senate in view of the overwhelming national demand for them. The conventions would be chosen solely on this question, whereas the members of the legislatures are chosen on a great many issues having nothing to do with prohibition. I am fairly sure that with the State conventions we should be able to eliminate national prohibition, and this of course is our main objective.

As a member of the Constitutional Liberty League of Massachusetts, I have always desired to oust prohibition from the Constitution. During the 13 disastrous years of nonenforcement, I have only been strengthened in my conviction that the only right way to do is to follow the directions on the signs we have lately seen on automobiles; namely, to repeal the eighteenth amendment.

May I assure you of my good wishes for your continued success?

Respectfully yours,

HENRY HARMON CHAMBERLIN.

NOT A MATTER OF BEER

The substitute for the eighteenth amendment is growing like a snowball rolling downhill. Opposition to the substitute is growing even faster. For the substitute does not repeal the amendment. It merely affirms Federal prohibition under another and, it may well be, a more dangerous form.

What the citizen thought he was going to receive from the Senate committee headed by Senator BLAINE was an amendment couched in the following words, "The eighteenth amendment is hereby repealed," and no more. That is the form recommended by ex-Governor Smith, Doctor Butler, and the Democratic convention, and if the November elections have any significance, it is the form which the people desire. The committee began with a paper containing two clauses, of which the first was the Smith-Butler declaration. The drys protested that this would leave the dry States without protection against the States which should legalize alcoholic beverages. Thereupon the committee, ignoring the existence of the Webb-Kenyon Act which gives this "protection," added another clause, which was not a constitutional enactment but simple Federal legislation, prohibiting the transportation or importation of alcoholic liquors from wet to dry States. Thus at the outset of its work the committee authorized a Federal control, which is the very source of the evils of which the country is complaining, and imbedded in the Constitution, which should be a statement of fundamental principles in government, an offensive form of sumptuary legislation.

But the committee did not stop even at this point. Yielding to the senseless clamor against the "saloon," an institution which no court and no individual has yet been able to define satisfactorily, it added a third clause giving Congress "concurrent power" to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold. The committee does not trust the States to exercise their police powers properly, but demands that the final decision as to whether or not beer can be consumed in a hotel dining room or at a corner saloon or at a soda fountain, or in none of these places, be vested solely in Congress, acting under authority conferred by the Federal Constitution. Petty sumptuary legislation could hardly be carried to a more absurd extreme. Whatever "concurrent power" may mean, it certainly does not mean that any State, or all of them, can overrule Federal legislation. In practice, it signifies that the States may do what seems best, unless Congress rules that another arrangement is best.

Throughout the hearings the committee has apparently labored under the delusion that what the country wants is permission to sop up beer and to guzzle whisky. That is far from the wishes of the men and women who for 13 years have led the fight against prohibition. As this review has repeatedly insisted, with us it is not a question of beer or of whisky, but wholly a question of good government. It is our conviction that temperance in the use of alcoholic beverages is best secured through the influence on the individual of religion and of education. Should this influence fail, so that intemperance becomes a menace to the peace and good order of the community, the necessary restrictions should be made and enforced by that community. In the regulation of personal habits, innocuous in themselves, yet subject to abuse, legislation should be the last, not the first, recourse. Further, legislation, if deemed necessary, should be enforceable. Otherwise it will only enhance the evil against which it is directed.

Thirteen years of sad experience have demonstrated beyond doubt that prohibition has no place in the Federal Constitution. It can not be enforced, and it brings with it a train of graft, perjury, murder, and general disrespect for law. Any substitute amendment which fails "to restore to the States their ancient right of local self-government," as Representative BECK writes, will perpetuate these frightful abuses, together with the fundamental vice of Federal prohibition which is its incompatibility with the spirit and purposes of the Constitution.

REDEEM THE PLEDGE

The prohibition repeal resolution as submitted to the Senate is a repudiation of the pledge in the platform of the Democratic Party upon which the election last November was won. The pledge was that the question of repeal should be submitted to constitutional conventions. The resolution before the Senate proposes that it be submitted to State legislatures.

There are compelling reasons why the issue should not be submitted to State legislatures. To do so would likely cause prolonged delay, inviting nation-wide participation in the fight in every State, opening opportunities for corruption, plunging the country into continued excitement and bad feeling, to say nothing of the chaotic conditions that would prevail while the issue was being settled. The resolution allows seven years for the States to act, no consideration being given to the certainty that the interim would be marked by steady aggravation of the evils that have been witnessed in the past decade. It is inconceivable that enforcement of prohibition would not go from bad to worse in view of the fact that many States have repealed their own Volstead laws.

Moreover, State legislatures would not be chosen solely on the issue of repeal, and election to these bodies would not constitute a referendum on prohibition. Many wets and drys will not cross party lines to vote their views on the liquor question. In choosing delegates to constitutional conventions voters would cast their ballots on a single proposition and express their convictions without giving thought to many other important matters that are involved in the selection of members of the legislature. Another objection is that legislatures of many States are not so constituted as to give equal representation to urban and rural voters. For this reason, even if Congress were held not to have authority to dictate the composition of the conventions, selection of delegates to them by direct vote of the people would supply a better test on prohibition.

The resolution under consideration violates the platform of the Democratic Party in another particular by retaining concurrent power in Congress to "regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be sold on the premises." This provision retains a police power in the Constitution of the United States which the Democratic Party is pledged to eliminate. Its retention would mean a continuation of policies that have aroused deep-seated hostility to the Volstead law. It is not repeal. It is modification. True, Senator WALSH of Montana is quoted as saying that he does not believe the power would ever be exercised by Congress. In that case there is no excuse for granting the power. However, we disagree with Senator WALSH and believe, on the contrary, that its retention would be a constant incentive to strife and would bring down upon Congress the forces that have bedeviled it in the past.

SALOON OR SPEAK-EASY—WHICH?

The open saloon was a destructive force of great magnitude. It catered to human depravity, and it was the flaunting of its shamelessness to the public everywhere that brought us prohibition.

To be sure, there were all kinds of saloons, just as there are all kinds of speak-easies, and it is difficult to frame a law that would set a definite dividing line. But admitting that the saloon was guilty of all that was charged against it, and more, too, we still have to acknowledge that the speak-easies are far worse.

They are unlawful and lawless to the last degree. There you will find the home of racketeering of the worst sort. Easy money is the tempting bait that aids and abets this criminality.

And now that prohibition is liable to receive its final deathblow we will indeed have a difficult problem before us. We will probably have to decide between the speak-easy and the saloon. It is needless to try to deceive ourselves. Why shut our eyes to a situation that we must face? We can not be hypocritical pretenders.

The liquor evil is with us. Prohibition has moved the saloons from the street corners into the speak-easies. And we know from bitter experience that the liquor habit can not be crushed by law. We have learned that lesson beyond all refutation.

And the question we will doubtless have to ask ourselves at this time is: Will we have the open saloon that is lawfully controlled, or will we have the speak-easy?

If we refuse to license the saloon, will it be possible to close the speak-easy?

We hear an unlimited amount of discussion as to what we must do when the Volstead law is repealed, and there is nearly always the associated warning that we must not go back to the saloon. But if we expect to close the speak-easy what other method can be used?

Some politicians are not averse to deceiving the public, and the speak-easies are hidden away on side streets. They do not flaunt their ugliness to the general public.

It is our belief, if we are compelled to choose between the two—and that seems to be the situation—that the saloon, licensed and controlled by governmental edicts, compelled to close at certain hours, is by far the lesser of the two evils.

And this is by no means an indorsement of the saloon. God forbid!

But there is no room for argument as to which is the lesser evil—the speak-easy or the saloon. There are literally hundreds of thousands of speak-easies doing business throughout the country at this time. If we have licensed saloons they can all be closed; if there are no saloons the speak-easies will undoubtedly find it profitable to remain in business.

And there seems to be no possible chance of closing them by legal measures. We know that in spite of all the efforts made through Federal and State edicts they have continued in business.

There is only one way to close them, and that is through legitimate competition by licensed drinking places. We can call them saloons, or whatever we please. No matter how much we may object to their presence we can not put them out of business.

They will either exist as a secret, unlawful business, or else they can be subject to close scrutiny, made to conform to certain definite rules through governmental license, which would at least materially lessen their evil influence.

There are still many who will doubtless condemn this attitude, but when we have an unpleasant situation to deal with it is foolish to close our eyes. It must be recognized and handled in the most effective manner.

We will candidly admit that all drinking places should be closed. We will go further and admit that prohibition, if it could be enforced, would be of infinite benefit to the Nation.

This we have tried for a decade or more and we have failed miserably, and when we ultimately find that we are compelled to choose between two destructive forces it is certainly desirable to select that which is the least harmful.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senate, except to express my own idea of this amendment in two or three minutes.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land. If this amendment should be adopted in this form, it would be the supreme law of the land. In other words, it would give to Congress the power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquor within the States.

If that power is given to Congress to regulate, it becomes important to know what "regulate" means. It means—

To adjust or control by rule, method, or established mode; to direct by rule or restriction; to subject to governing principles or laws.

If this amendment should become a part of the Constitution containing section 3, it would take away from the State the right the State now has to regulate or prohibit the sale of liquor. It would take it away by giving that power to Congress.

In other words, if section 3 should become a part of the Constitution of the United States and the State of Alabama desired to prohibit the sale of liquor in a saloon and Congress should determine that it would regulate the sale of liquor in Alabama merely by imposing a license tax of $1,000, the right of Alabama to go any further would be denied. It could not prohibit the sale of liquor in Alabama, because that right would be reserved to the Congress of the United States by this section of the amendment. In other words, this is not an amendment which would give to the States an added right with reference to the control of liquor within its boundaries. It is an amendment which would take away from every State in the Union the right to determine how it would regulate the liquor traffic within its boundaries.

Mr. President, I am opposed to that. I voted against it in the committee. Since it remained in the proposal, I voted against a favorable report of the joint resolution. I desire to state now, because I shall not make any further remarks, that if this section is not stricken from the resolution, I shall vote against a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people. I favor the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to the people, to be voted upon by conventions, unless there is added this provision which takes away from every State in the Union the power to determine whether or not it shall regulate or prohibit the sale of liquor within its boundaries. This would go to exactly the opposite extreme of the eighteenth amendment. The eighteenth amendment prohibits the sale of liquor in any State. If this amendment should become the law of the land, no State would have the right to prohibit the sale of liquor within its own boundaries if it saw fit to do so, for Congress would have already asserted its right to enact a law covering that subject.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land. It is not difficult to imagine that there might be a Congress which would be opposed to any State passing a prohibition law. Let us suppose that were the case, and that Congress should pass a law saying, "We will undertake to regulate the sale of liquor," and then should say, "We will regulate it by providing that liquor may be sold within a State"—and it would have that right, under this provision—"but those desiring to sell it must first pay a license of $1,000." That would be the supreme law of the land, because it would be enacted under the Constitution itself.

Mr. President, in so far as I am concerned, I shall vote to strike out section 3. If section 3 is not stricken out, I shall vote against the submission of the amendment. I simply wanted the RECORD to show the facts, so that those who voted might have called to their attention the fact that, instead of being a movement to permit the States to prohibit the sale of liquor in a saloon, this amendment would deprive the States of the right to prohibit the sale of liquor in a saloon. Both the State and the Federal Government can not have the power at the same time. The action of one of them will be the supreme law of the land, and the supreme law of every State is the Constitution of the United States. When the Constitution delegates to Congress the right to determine in what way liquor shall be sold in a State, if it is sold, then a law enacted by Congress will be supreme, and the States of this Union will be helpless, they can not regulate the sale of liquor within their own boundaries, nor can they prohibit it.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the third section for the reasons I have stated, and for the further reason that it would result in a state of chaos and confusion. This matter should be submitted back to the people, to be voted upon fairly and squarely upon its merits, and not with an amendment which would further take away from the people a right which they have had heretofore. They would be far better off if they desired to prohibit the sale of liquor within their States, if there should be a plain, bald, naked repeal of the eighteenth amendment, because then they could regulate or prohibit the sale of liquor in the States as they saw fit, and not in the manner Congress saw fit to prescribe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ashurst | Costigan | Hull | Robinson, Ind. |
| Bailey | Couzens | Johnson | Russell |
| Bankhead | Dale | Kean | Schuyler |
| Barbour | Davis | Kendrick | Sheppard |
| Barkley | Dickinson | Keyes | Shipstead |
| Bingham | Dill | La Follette | Smith |
| Black | Fess | Lewis | Steiwer |
| Blaine | Frazier | Logan | Stephens |
| Borah | George | McGill | Townsend |
| Bratton | Glass | McKellar | Trammell |
| Brookhart | Goldsborough | McNary | Tydings |
| Bulkley | Gore | Neely | Vandenberg |
| Bulow | Hale | Norbeck | Wagner |
| Byrnes | Harrison | Norris | Walcott |
| Capper | Hastings | Nye | Walsh, Mass. |
| Caraway | Hatfield | Patterson | White |
| Clark | Hayden | Pittman | |
| Connally | Hebert | Robinson, Ark. | |

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] seems to be very much disturbed because the lame ducks are going to have a vote on this amendment. So far as I am concerned, I am one of the lame ducks who do not want that responsibility. I have been perfectly willing all the time to pass it over to the Senator from Arkansas when he will be in control of the majority in the United States Senate in the session soon to be held. But I want to say to the Senator that since he has forced the decision upon me, I do not want him to do all the squawking.

Mr. President, at this time I am going to speak briefly upon the amendment under consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to propose a unanimous-consent agreement that we proceed to the consideration of the pending amendment, giving the Senator from Iowa 10 minutes to conclude his remarks, and then recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning; and that at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon we vote upon the pending joint resolution and all pending amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, just a moment. I very much desire to vote on the pending amendment if I possibly can, but the Committee on Banking and Currency are holding hearings relating to the New York Stock Exchange and there are many Senators who will be present at those hearings to-morrow morning. Would it not be possible to take a recess until 12 o'clock instead of 11 o'clock?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We propose to vote to-night, in just a few minutes, on the pending amendment. There will probably be no further votes until the debate has been closed to-morrow.

Mr. McNARY. I am willing to yield to the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota and change the proposal accordingly; that is, that we proceed to the consideration of the pending amendment after the Senator from Iowa has 10 minutes in which to discuss the matter——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I do not think I shall need more than 10 minutes, but a time limit always has a tendency to confuse me a little.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I ask unanimous consent that after the vote on the pending amendment the Senate recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon we shall vote without further debate upon the pending joint resolution and all amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH. At 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon we are to vote without further debate on the joint resolution and all amendments to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But we are to vote to-night on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I shall address myself at this time to section 3 and the motion to strike it out, which is the pending question. The Congress of the United States has no power except that which is given to it by the Constitution of the United States. If this amendment should be adopted, which I do not think it ever will be, it would be a part of the Constitution.

Section 3 as worded provides that "Congress shall have concurrent power." It does not say that Congress shall have "supreme" power, but "concurrent power," that is to say, "concurrent power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk at the premises where sold." That power is concurrent with what? It is concurrent with the power of the State. Therefore the State has concurrent power with the Congress and the powers are equal. Neither is supreme.

Under the terms of the amendment it would be possible for the State of New York or the State of Pennsylvania or any other State to legalize the saloon, which the amendment seeks to describe. They could make it a legal institution. At the same time Congress, with its concurrent power, could prohibit that same saloon and make it an illegal institution. That is an unthinkable provision to have in the Constitution. I am going to vote to leave it in because I think a repeal of the eighteenth amendment is a more unthinkable thing than this unthinkable section.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] will offer an amendment that would correct this inconsistency. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has made a suggestion and I believe the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] made a suggestion that would correct the inconsistency by striking out the word "concurrent." If that were done then the section would read:

> Congress shall have power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drunk on the premises where sold.

If it were worded that way, there would be no question, I think, about the supreme power of Congress to regulate the saloon. It would take further legislative enactment, of course, to do that, but as it stands now we are going into this pandemonium of legal war of the States with the National Government; but since we are going into a national civil war with everything that is moral and decent on the one side and with drunkenness and disorder and intoxicating liquor generally on the other side, I think even this disorderly section 3 is preferable to the amendment without any restrictions whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS, when his name was called). On this question the present occupant of the chair is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. If the present occupant of the chair were permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL'S name was called). As previously announced, my colleague [Mr. HOWELL], is absent on official business of the Senate. If he were present and voting on this question, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BINGHAM (when Mr. METCALF'S name was called). The senior senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], who is necessarily absent, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when his name was called). Upon this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is absent on account of the death of his father. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF].

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea." An announcement of his pair has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS). The present occupant of the chair announces the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 32, as follows:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ashurst | Bulkley | Hull | Trammell |
| Bailey | Bulow | Johnson | Tydings |
| Barbour | Byrnes | Kean | Vandenberg |
| Barkley | Clark | Kendrick | Wagner |
| Bingham | Couzens | La Follette | Walcott |
| Black | Davis | Lewis | Walsh, Mass. |
| Blaine | Harrison | McKellar | |
| Borah | Hayden | Pittman | |
| Bratton | Hebert | Robinson, Ark. | |

NAYS—32

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Bankhead | Dill | Hatfield | Russell |
| Brookhart | Frazier | Keyes | Schuyler |
| Capper | George | Logan | Sheppard |
| Caraway | Glass | McGill | Shipstead |
| Connally | Goldsborough | Neely | Steiwer |
| Costigan | Gore | Nye | Stephens |
| Dale | Hale | Patterson | Townsend |
| Dickinson | Hastings | Robinson, Ind. | White |

NOT VOTING—31

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Austin | Glenn | Norbeck | Smoot |
| Broussard | Grammer | Norris | Swanson |
| Carey | Howell | Oddie | Thomas, Idaho |
| Coolidge | King | Reed | Thomas, Okla. |
| Copeland | Long | Reynolds | Walsh, Mont. |
| Cutting | McNary | Schall | Watson |
| Fess | Metcalf | Shortridge | Wheeler |
| Fletcher | Moses | Smith | |

So the amendment proposed by Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas to the amendment was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 349) creating a special committee of the Senate to investigate air mail and ocean mail contracts, reported it with amendments, submitted a report (No. 1229) thereon, and moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6292) to prevent professional prize fighting and to authorize amateur boxing in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1230) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11504) authorizing the sale of certain Government property in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1231) thereon.

RECESS

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement, I now move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being, under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, until to-morrow, Thursday, February 16, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose light is as the morning and whose glory is as the rising of the sun, we thank Thee that there is not one human life beyond Thy love and care. With relentless determination and unyielding courage may we lose ourselves in unremitting toil in the service of our country. Enable us to set free our fullest and our ripest powers in the solution of the baffling problems which confront us. O stir within us the song of hope, and defeat everlastingly the dirge of despair. Animate us with the faith and the sacrifice of those heroic souls who made possible the glory of our Republic, and transform all needless alarms, groundless fears, and false prophecies into abiding victories. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CLARENCE R. KILLION

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2148) for the relief of Clarence R. Killion, with House amendments, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. HILL of Alabama, MONTET, and CHIPERFIELD.

GEORGE W. M'DONALD

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4368) for the relief of George W. McDonald, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "soldiers," insert "and their widows."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of the widow of George W. McDonald."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1934

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 13710) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13710) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 6, 9, 25, and 26.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 27, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, and 46, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert "with the exception of attorneys"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$355,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: ": Provided further, That the unexpended balance of the appropriation contained in the Interior Department appropriation act, fiscal year 1932, for the construction and equipment of the Albuquerque Sanatorium, and employees' quarters, New Mexico, and not to exceed $300,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the Sioux Sanatorium and employees' quarters, South Dakota, contained in the same act, are hereby continued available for the same purposes until June 30, 1934"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$110,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$210,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,992,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13710) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

On No. 1: Restores the language stricken out by the Senate modified so as to except attorneys from the group of employees to be appointed after competitive examination by the Civil Service Commission and from an eligible list furnished by such commission.

On No. 2: Eliminates, as proposed by the Senate, the provision of the House bill permitting the use of tribal funds of the Pueblo Indians, New Mexico, for "general purposes, except per capita payments," as might be of direct benefit to the several pueblos.

On No. 3: Appropriates $103,521.67, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $114,430, as proposed by the House, for expenses incidental to the sale of timber.

On No. 4: Appropriates $20,000 as proposed by the Senate, from tribal funds, for insect-control work on the Klamath Indian Reservation, instead of $10,000 as proposed by the House.

On No. 5: Appropriates $355,000 for the purpose of developing agriculture and stock raising among Indians, instead of $315,000 as proposed by the House and $373,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 6: Eliminates the Senate provision making available not to exceed $2,500 to pay in whole or in part expenses of Federal, State, or county extension agents and home-demonstration agents or specialists for work in the Indian Service.

On Nos. 7 and 8: Appropriates $3,000 from tribal funds for industrial assistance of Indians on the Klamath Reservation, Oreg., as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 9: Eliminates the provision inserted by the Senate making $6,000 available for aid of the public-school districts of Uintah and Duchesne Counties, Utah.

On Nos. 10 and 11: Makes the appropriation for construction of physical improvements at Indian schools immediately available and eliminates the appropriation of $11,000 for repairs to the Eastern Navajo School building, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 12: Continues available during the fiscal year 1934 the unexpended balance of appropriation contained in the Interior Department appropriation act, fiscal year 1933, for shop building, including equipment, at Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans., as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 13: Continues available during the fiscal year 1934 the unexpended balance of the appropriation contained in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1932, for new school building and auditorium, including equipment, at Pipestone, Minn., as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 14: Continues available during the fiscal year 1934 the unexpended balance of the appropriation contained in the Interior Department appropriation act, fiscal year 1933, for central heating plant, Wahpeton School, North Dakota, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 15: Appropriates $3,755,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $4,745,000, as proposed by the House, for nonreservation boarding schools.

On No. 16: Continues available during the fiscal year 1934 the unexpended balance of the appropriation contained in Interior Department appropriation act, fiscal year 1933, for construction and equipment of Albuquerque Sanatorium, and employees' quarters, New Mexico, and not to exceed $300,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the Sioux Sanatorium and employees' quarters, South Dakota, as contained in the same act, instead of reappropriating the total unexpended balance in each instance as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 17 and 18: Appropriate $44,900 for general support of the Klamath Indians, Oregon, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 19 and 20: Appropriate $35,000 for general support of the Colville Indians, Washington, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $30,000, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 21 and 22: Appropriate $55,000 for Keshena Indians, Wisconsin, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 23: Corrects total.

BUREAU OF RECLAMATION

On No. 24: Provides authority for a 10 per cent interchange of appropriations under the reclamation fund, as proposed by the Senate.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

On Nos. 25 and 26: Appropriate $300,000 for geologic surveys, with limitation of not to exceed $265,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, as proposed by the House, instead of an appropriation of $325,000, with limitation of $280,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 27: Appropriates $30,000 for continuation of investigation of mineral resources of Alaska, as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 28 and 29: Appropriate $110,000 for printing and binding, instead of $100,000, as proposed by the House, and $120,000, as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 30: Appropriates $225,000 for mineral leasing, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $200,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 31: Corrects total.

NATIONAL-PARK SERVICE

On No. 32: Eliminates language of the House requiring the salary of the superintendent to be subject to compensation reduction or furlough without pay requirement as such language is unnecessary to insure such reduction.

On Nos. 33 and 34: Appropriates $54,200 for administration, protection, and maintenance, as proposed by the Senate, for the Acadia National Park, Me., instead of $49,200, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 35 and 36: Appropriate $25,000 for administration, protection, and maintenance, Lassen Volcanic National Park, Calif., as proposed by the Senate, instead of $18,500, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 37 and 38: Appropriate $40,940 for administration, protection, and maintenance, Zion National Park, Utah, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $38,500, as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 39 and 40: Appropriate $70,000 for the park service, the control, and the prevention of spread of forest insects, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $63,000, as proposed by the House.

VIRGIN ISLANDS

On Nos. 41, 42, 43, 44, and 45: Appropriate $197,000 for defraying the deficits in the treasuries of the municipal governments of St. Thomas and St. John and municipality of St. Croix, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $210,000, as proposed by the House.

On No. 46: Corrects the total for Howard University.

BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman inform the House as to the total amount carried in the act, under the original estimate?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I can give the figures. The amount of the Interior Department appropriations for 1933 was $67,183,684.35. The amount carried in this bill for 1934 as agreed upon in this conference report is $43,753,935.67. This bill is $23,429,748.68 below the appropriations for 1933 for this department.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where are the savings?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The savings are, I think, equitably scattered all through the activities of the Interior Department from the Arctic Circle to the Equator.

Mr. STAFFORD. My inquiry was directed as to the amount under the Budget estimate, as carried by the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The amount under the Budget estimate is $2,329,993.33.

Mr. STAFFORD. In scanning the bill I notice the committee only allowed the interchangeable item of 10 per cent, as far as the Reclamation Service is concerned.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture, which is to follow shortly, the committee has recommended an interchangeable item applicable to all items. May I inquire of the gentleman whether, in the administration of the Interior Department, where there was a drastic cut of 10 per cent in last year's appropriation act, there is any evidence that the department suffered by reason of that reduction?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, the construction work has been reduced and various activities curtailed, but I do not think the general welfare of the Government has suffered any material injury by reason of the reduction of about 35 per cent during the past two years. However, the Senate amendment No. 24, to which the gentleman refers, making 10 per cent of the appropriations available interchangeably for expenditures on the reclamation projects, applies only to that special reclamation fund set apart especially for reclamation and irrigation projects. That provision is necessary to take care of emergency repairs from floods or unusual conditions.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I am directing the attention of the House to the fact that one committee as to one department does not apply any interchangeable allowance of 10 per cent, except as to one minor matter, the reclamation fund, but as to the Department of Agriculture the committee brings in an interchangeable item of 10 per cent that applies to all the activities of the Department of Agriculture. Apparently there is no uniformity in the position of the Committee on Appropriations as to this interchangeable item.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill carries a general provision of that kind applicable to practically all the general appropriations from the Federal Treasury for the departments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then what was the need of putting in a limited 10 per cent application as far as the reclamation fund is concerned?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Because the reclamation fund is a special fund created and set apart for the construction of irrigation works, dams, reservoirs, canals, and ditches throughout the arid States of the West, and I assume the Senate thought that general provision would not apply to the Reclamation Bureau or to that fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is well aware there has been no agreement as to the Treasury and Post Office Departments bill, because it has not yet been agreed upon in conference.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I realize that that general provision has not yet become a law.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understood the gentleman from Colorado, he stated that this bill carried about $2,300,000 less than was estimated?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. It is that much under the Budget recommendation.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, practically two millions of that comes about because of no appropriation for Boulder Dam. Is that true?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Budget recommended an appropriation of $10,000,000 for the Boulder Canyon project for the fiscal year 1934 and this Interior Department subcommittee reduced that amount to eight millions.

Mr. SNELL. That will probably have to be appropriated later in a deficiency bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The committee did not think $10,000,000 would be needed during the coming year, because they have an unexpended balance of over $10,000,000 from former appropriations. However, if they need it they can and will get it in a deficiency bill. There is no use of appropriating more than they need.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will these reductions, aside from the $2,000,000, in any way impair the Indian schools or educational work of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; not at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Or conservation work intrusted to that department?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I do not think so. I am confident I voice the sentiment of every member of this subcommittee, of which I am proud to be the chairman, in saying we are doing our utmost for the welfare of the Indians and are constantly trying to aid them in getting into a position where they will become self-supporting and independent and have more comfortable homes and better conditions.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman compare the totals reported by the conference committee with those appropriated by the House and the Senate?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. The Senate increased the amount of the bill as it passed the House by $154,031.67. In conference the House conferees conceded $101,031.67, and the Senate conferees receded to the extent of $53,000. So that, considering the bill carries over $43,000,000 and thousands of items, there is but very little really in controversy.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1934

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14643) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14643, with Mr. PRALL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, at the time the committee rose yesterday afternoon I had reserved a point of order against the pending paragraph. I did not at that time have the opportunity of stating what the point was.

The point of order is directed at the language in the bill on line 10, page 2, which reads as follows:

> And the tax rate in effect on the fiscal year 1933 on real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia shall not be decreased for the fiscal year 1934.

I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that this is legislation on an appropriation bill.

For the information of the Chair, the existing permanent law on the subject is found in the report of the committee on this bill at page 22. The law is there quoted. I will not take the time of the Chair to read the law, but merely to state its general purport.

This law provides that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall annually fix the rate of taxation in a sufficient amount to meet the appropriations and, so to speak, balance their budget.

This provision changes that law. It takes from the District Commissioners the power they have under the general permanent law on the subject.

For the further information of the Chair I may say this provision has been carried for several years in the District of Columbia appropriation bill. This question has been before the House on similar matters. I refer the Chair to a decision made in the Fifty-eighth Congress found in Volume IV of Hinds' Precedents, section 3822. The same question arose there, Mr. Chairman. In that instance there was language in an Army appropriation bill to the effect that no ships might be sold in certain instances without the permission of Congress. A point of order was made against that language of the bill. In reply the committee defended the bill on the ground that similar language had been carried in the bill for four or five years. The Chair sustained the point of order. The decision is found on page 553 of Volume IV. I will read it if the Chair wishes me to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has that decision before him.

Does the gentleman from Missouri wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is not material whether the point of order is sustained or overruled, for the reason that yesterday before this point of order was presented we drafted an amendment to strike out this language and substitute a provision which I will offer as soon as the point of order is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia makes a point of order against the language appearing on page 2, line 10, which reads as follows:

> And the tax rate in effect in the fiscal year 1933 on real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia shall not be decreased for the fiscal year 1934.

The point of order is that this language is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The Chair is of the opinion that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: On page 2, line 10, after the word "Columbia," add the following: "And the tax rate on the full value and no less of the real estate and tangible personal property subject to taxation in the District of Columbia shall be $1.50 per $100."

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to have the attention of the members of the committee for just a minute.

We are just starting on the consideration of this bill. It is my understanding that practically every reduction it makes in the Budget estimates—practically every economy it proposes to effect—will be attacked by amendments proposing to raise these amounts.

Mr. Chairman, the control of the purse strings of a nation is the highest prerogative of a legislative body. And the right to vote to appropriate money from the Public Treasury is the gravest responsibility a Member of Congress can exercise. It is a particularly solemn responsibility at this time. To-day, as never before, the country and the taxpayers are scrutinizing the attitude taken by Members of Congress on appropriations and retrenchments of expenditures.

This demand for economy in government, and this disposition to hold legislators to account for failure to decrease the cost of government, grows daily more insistent. Let me read to you extracts from just a few letters received in this morning's mail on this subject.

Here is a letter from the Board of Commerce of Manistee, Mich., from which I read:

We wish to remind you of the absolute necessity of reducing Federal expenditures at once. This is no time for additional taxation. The most drastic economy is necessary if there is to be any recovery.

Another letter is from Philadelphia, Pa., in which the following statement is made:

Unless some action is taken by your body and something definite done to balance the Federal Budget things will continue to get worse until there is nothing with which to balance it. We are writing you bluntly because it is high time something is done.

The Hartford Chamber of Commerce of Hartford, Conn., writes:

The United States Chamber of Commerce advocates a reduction in Federal expenditures of $800,000,000 for 1934. The directors of the Hartford Chamber of Commerce unanimously indorse this proposal and urge you to give this your favorable consideration.

The Chamber of Commerce of Muskegon, Mich., in a letter just received this morning says:

In view of the tremendous decline in business we again urge upon you the necessity of reducing Federal expenditures for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1933, to an absolute minimum. The urgency of the crisis impels up to impress upon you and upon your associates in Congress the need for drastic economy.

The Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., writes this morning:

Business is universally concerned with the problem of balancing the Federal Budget and a sharp reduction in cost of government. We urge the concentration of your committee on reducing Federal expenditures.

The Chamber of Commerce of Torrance, Calif., in a letter which has just come to hand, admonishes:

There is substantially unanimous agreement that the Federal Budget must be brought into balance. The directorate of the Torrance Chamber of Commerce hereby urges our Members of Congress, both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, to take full cognizance by means of real economy rather than resorting to the expediency of levying new taxes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The Mansfield Chamber of Commerce, of Mansfield, Ohio, writes this morning:

The board of directors of the Mansfield Chamber of Commerce in regular session assembled on Monday, February, 6, 1933, by formal action, have instructed me to convey to you as a member of the House Committee on Appropriations the following message: "We are of the opinion that economies totaling upward of $750,000,000 can be effected and we urge upon you a vigorous and militant attitude and action in accomplishing this end."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman the resolution passed by the national chamber of commerce?

Mr. CANNON. It was received by all Members of the Congress several days ago, and I did not consider it necessary to more than refer to it. As the gentleman doubtless recalls, it is even more emphatic in its recommendations and insists on a reduction of at least $800,000,000 in the cost of government.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish the gentleman would refer to it and call attention to what it is demanding.

Mr. CANNON. Here is a letter—apparently a circular letter addressed to all Members of the House—from the Chamber of Commerce of Utica, N. Y., from which I quote:

For the fiscal year ending June 31, 1934, there will be another huge deficit unless the Government's expenses are sharply curtailed. Believing that no other action by Congress can do so much to develop confidence, the Nation's business men are demanding a cut to bring the Federal Budget into balance.

Mr. Chairman, our mails are filled with letters from individuals, but these letters are from boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other organizations of business men. They come from every section of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The people are aroused. They are demanding that any possible waste or extravagance be eliminated from these appropriation bills; and I say to you that, if they are not eliminated and if expenses are not retrenched wherever possible and the business of these departments conducted in a businesslike way, we are going to hear from the country as we have never heard before.

Mr. Chairman, the District appropriation bill is a particularly difficult bill, for the reason that its beneficiaries are on our doorstep. Every man downtown who wants a job in the District government, either for himself or for his friends, every man in the public service who wants to spend more public money, is up here interceding with every Member he knows. Now, there is no objection to that. They have a perfect right to call on Members or appear before committees, and we welcome them. No citizen of the District has ever asked to appear before the District subcommittee who was not granted a hearing. But may I earnestly suggest that, after they have been heard and the bill has been reported, Members take into consideration the personal interest of the applicant and the disinterested position of the committee and investigate fully before they propose increases in appropriations or support amendments to overrule the carefully considered decisions of the committee who have made exhaustive studies of these questions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we operating under a reservation of a point of order or discussing a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is proceeding under a reservation of a point of order.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is always an unpleasant duty to deny appeals for appropriations. It is much easier to be a good fellow and go along and give them what they want. But, Mr. Chairman, no bureau of any department of the Government is ever satisfied. They are constantly asking more employees, more supplies, and more money, and the District government is no exception to the rule. The cost of government in the District is increasing out of all proportion to its increase in population or wealth. At the beginning of the World War, in 1913, the cost per capita with a population of 353,443 was $30.20; last year, with a population of 491,000, the cost per capita was $96.70. While population has grown 39 per cent, expenditures have grown 220 per cent, and are increasing every year by leaps and bounds. Unless some one can be relied upon to try to hold down the increase in this already vast sum, there is no end to it, and for that reason we are asking you this morning to cooperate with us in this unpleasant duty of holding down these numerous proposals to amend the bill and increase these already generous amounts.

For, Mr. Chairman, we have been very moderate in our economies in the writing of this bill. In comparison with the other appropriation bills we are far down the list in the amounts of our reductions below the Budget estimates. For example, the first deficiency of 1933 cut 10 per cent below the Budget estimates. The Department of the Interior bill of last year was 11 per cent below the Budget estimate. The legislative bill was 10.2 per cent below the Budget estimate, while the District bill made the moderate cut of 9½ per cent.

This year the legislative bill cut appropriations 22 per cent below the estimates submitted by the Budget Bureau, while the District bill before you this morning cuts only 8 per cent below the estimates. It lacks 1½ per cent of being as economical as last year's bill, and yet the District papers are charging that it is the most unreasonable bill ever reported for the support of the District government.

We submit to the House that on the face of these comparative statistics the bill we have reported and which is under consideration here this morning is more than generous to the District and its activities.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

Mr. GOSS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. Are we not operating under a reservation of a point of order, the time being controlled by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia reserved a point of order to the amendment, and we are proceeding under the reservation of that point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in the formulation of the District bill we are largely dependent for information and recommendation upon the representatives of the District departments, and especially upon the Board of Commissioners. Let me take advantage of this opportunity to express my high regard—and the regard of every member of the committee—for each of the commissioners who compose this board. They are without exception men of the highest integrity and ability. They have difficult positions to fill and they have administered them with unfailing capacity and fidelity. The committee desires to express to them its appreciation of their invaluable cooperation during the years we have served with them in the formulation of the annual District bills. It is to be regretted that the change in the national administration will probably require the selection of a new board. I am certain that in all the body of the citizenship of the District of Columbia it will be impossible to find three men better equipped for this arduous and exacting work or commissioners who will discharge their duties with more credit to themselves or greater advantage to the District.

Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment proposes to reduce the tax rate on real estate in the District. The present tax rate is $1.70 on $100. I am proposing by this amendment to reduce it to $1.50 on a hundred. That will save the taxpayers of the District from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000 a year. The committee has all along been under the impression—and any Member of the House who reads the hearings on this bill will inevitably get the impression—that the officials of the District wished to accumulate a surplus to their credit in the Treasury. Every year for the last three years when the District officials came before the committee they called attention in their opening statements to the fact that their former surplus of nine and a half million dollars had been so depleted that it stands to-day at about half a million dollars or less. In each of the last three annual hearings this point has been stressed, and the committee received the impression that they objected to the reduction of the surplus and desired to maintain it. Accordingly, with that in mind, when we first drafted the bill we did not include a reduction in the tax rate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not hear all of the gentleman's statement, but as I understand, the purpose of the amendment we are now discussing is to reduce the tax rate in the District of Columbia, the ad valorem tax rate, from $1.70 to $1.50.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the gentleman's opinion from the information that he has that that reduction, on the present valuation, will afford sufficient fiscal revenues for the District for all of its necessary expenditures, without the District officials coming back to Congress for an increase in the Federal contribution?

Mr. CANNON. The interviews of local officials through the newspapers and the editorials in the newspapers of the District emphasize the fact that if this bill goes through as it is, it will leave a surplus in the Federal Treasury of approximately six and one-half million dollars.

Mr. BANKHEAD. To the credit of the District of Columbia fund?

Mr. CANNON. To the credit of the District in the Treasury.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Another question. Of course, as I understand it, we will be called upon here to add an appropriation of $625,000 for relief in the District of Columbia. If the District of Columbia has that balance to its credit, why can not it spend some of that money for this relief?

Mr. CANNON. That will be taken up when we reach that item in the reading of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman then is firm in his conviction that this reduction in the tax rate will not cripple the treasury of the District of Columbia beyond where it would be required to carry on the essential expenses?

Mr. CANNON. As I said before, the only information which the committee has in respect to these fiscal matters is necessarily the information that is given us by the officials of the District in the hearings before the committee, and those officials tell us, and the newspapers of the District call attention to the fact—as does the minority report of the committee—that this bill will create a surplus in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia. We were led to believe they wanted that surplus. It develops now that they do not want it. And so, in response to this demand, we are asking that a reduction be made in the tax rate of the District in order to avoid the accumulation of this surplus and to give the home owners in the district as low a tax rate as possible. Without this reduction, the bill will provide a District surplus in the Treasury of $6,500,000.

This reduction in taxes will take from $2,000,000 to $2,500,000 from that surplus, and if this amendment is passed it will still leave in the Federal Treasury, to the account of the District government, a surplus of $4,000,000 or $4,500,000 at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. MAPES. Could not the same purpose which the gentleman has in mind be accomplished, and would it not be more equitable, in view of the economic conditions in the District of Columbia, which are better than any other place in the United States, and in view of the fact that the tax burden here is less than almost anywhere else in the United States, if the Federal contribution carried in this bill were reduced this year from $6,500,000 to $1,500,000? In that way the present tax rate of $17 per $1,000 of assessed valuation would probably be required to raise enough money to balance the Budget without carrying this rate provision in the bill and without building up a surplus.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would it interrupt the gentleman to ask another question?

Mr. CANNON. May I answer the gentleman's question first? In response to a request from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as expressed in the hearings before the committee, we took up the problem of making an appropriation for District relief from the exclusive funds of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. There are only two ways in which that can be accomplished. One is the method adopted by the committee, and carried in this bill, levying a specific tax for that specific purpose. The other is the method just suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. It could be done either way. Either the amount could be raised by separate taxation in the District, or the Federal contribution could be reduced by that amount. Both methods would comply with the request of the commissioners to supply the item from purely District funds. One would be as effective as the other. If they do not prefer the method suggested by the committee, then they can adopt the method suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. Either would be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am simply asking for information. I desire to go along with the gentleman. As I understood the gentleman's amendment, it proposes to reduce the tax rate, based on the full value of property in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CANNON. That is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is property assessed at full value under the present arrangement?

Mr. CANNON. That is the information given the committee by the assessor.

The purport of this amendment is, in brief, to reduce taxes on real estate in the District. It was not included in the bill originally because it was our understanding that they wished to replace the surplus formerly carried in the Treasury. Now that they have indicated their objection to the accumulation of a surplus, we are glad to avoid such a surplus by reducing the tax rate. That is what we propose to do by this amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has reserved a point of order. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to have the substitute before the House. The gentleman might be willing to accept one of the amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the gentleman will yield for a moment, I wish to make a brief statement. The very object I had in view in making the original point of order was in order that the people of the District of Columbia might enjoy a reduction in their taxes if their budget justified it. The amendment which the gentleman has offered does the very thing that I sought to do in making the point of order against the original language of the bill, and it reduces the tax rate from $1.70 to $1.50. I think that is highly commendable. While I do not agree with the principle of legislation on an appropriation bill, nevertheless I will withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLADAY. This amendment is legislation the same as the other. The Chair just sustained a point of order. One was $1.70 and the other is $1.50.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] desire to be heard on that point?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would obviate a situation referred to in the minority report. If the minority prefer to repudiate the report, there will be no objection. We propose here to reduce taxes for the District of Columbia. The minority report objects to the maintenance of a surplus fund to the credit of the District. This will reduce that surplus and at the same time reduce taxes of the home owners of the city.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PRALL). The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Page 2, line 7, strike out "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500,000."

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 7, strike out "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment carries out the judgment and wisdom and suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. When I first came here the tax rate in the District of Columbia was 90 cents on $100. At that time we had an outrageous plan here which made the people of the United States, after paying their own taxes at home, their State, county, city, school taxes, their water tax, their paving tax, and all their other municipal taxes, they then had to pay one-half of the city tax here in Washington for the people living here.

Then, the rate was increased to $1, then to $1.10, then to $1.20, and we increased the proportion that the District should pay of its own taxes to three-quarters instead of one-half. Finally, the taxes went up to $1.30, and then $1.60, and $1.70.

If the District were to cut down its waste and cut out its extravagances the tax rate here ought not to be over $1.50. I just want to call your attention to one of the extravagances of the city. If you will look at page 516 of the hearings you will see that our subcommittee required the District Commissioners to put in here the amounts they had expended for sending various officials connected with the District, little and big, off on junket trips over the United States. Look at some of them! Here is a bunch of policemen they sent off to police school. Here is Mr. W. A. Van Duzer, a good friend of ours, we all like him; he was sent off on several junket trips. They sent him up to New York at an expense of $16.28; up to New York again; then up to New York a third time at $16.28; then to Chicago at $16.95; then back to Chicago again at an expense of $38.43. Those are his junket trips—just one employee of the District government, all since July 1, 1932.

Then, coming down the list you will see they send the Hon. Sibyl Baker of the playgrounds department off on a junket way out to Los Angeles, Calif., at a cost of $300 to the people of the District and to the people of the United States. The District Commissioners allowed her to spend $300 on that junket trip to the west coast. Then they sent her on another trip, Hon. Sibyl Baker, to Toronto, Canada, at a cost of $87.96 more.

Then they sent Richard S. Tennyson to Toronto, Canada, at a cost of $78.02. Then the commissioners sent Mr. Herbert L. Davis down to my State, to Houston, where I was born, and to Galveston, at a cost of $171.29. Then they sent him up to New York for $50 worth, and they sent him to Chicago for $74.97 worth. Then they sent him up to Portland, Oreg., and Los Angeles, Calif. He had to go out to Hollywood and it cost $300 more.

Is not this ridiculous?

I know what my friend, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], thinks about these matters.

It ought to stop! It ought to stop!

So you can go through the whole list. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein this whole list showing the junket trips since July 1, 1932, the commissioners have paid for out of the public exchequer for various officials.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I quote from the hearings:

"In regard to the expense of a trip to Detroit made by employees and officials of the District government in January, 1933, the following statement is submitted:

"W. A. Van Duzer, H. C. Whitehurst, and F. M. Davison, paid by American Road Builders' Association.

"H. F. Clemmer, paid by District; estimated cost, $100.

"J. N. Robertson and R. L. Bourgeois, paid by District; estimated cost, $150."

Mr. CANNON. I should also be glad to have in this connection a report of the expenses of all who have attended meetings at a distance at District expense for the past year.

Mr. DONOVAN. For the fiscal year 1932, and up to this date in the fiscal year 1933?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Official travel authorized by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the period July 1, 1931, to January 15, 1933—Continued

Mr. BLANTON. Do not you think that the foregoing shows a pretty good-sized travel expense for the employees of one city the size of Washington, for a little over six months, to wit, since July 1, 1932, to the date of these hearings?

Mr. HOLADAY. If I remember correctly, last year, the gentleman from Texas voted for this appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I did not. I have not voted for any travel allowances, because I do not believe in junkets; I never take them myself.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call special attention to a few of these travels. Here is Mr. Richards, our tax assessor. He had to take a trip to New York and it cost $20.03. Then he had to go to Atlanta, Ga., at a cost of $63. And here is Dr. William Fowler, of the health department. He had to go to Montreal at a cost of $76.29. There is a whole bunch of them here. Hon. Clara W. Herbert, of the library department, had to take a trip to New Orleans, at a cost of $100. It ought to stop.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. As I understand it, if the gentleman's amendment reducing the Federal contribution from $6,500,000 to $1,500,000 should be adopted and the total amounts carried in this bill should be appropriated, the District still would not have to raise the present tax rate on real estate and tangible personal property above $17 per $1,000, which is lower than the tax rate in almost any other city in the United States, in order to balance the Budget?

Mr. BLANTON. That is correct. It would merely eliminate this surplus the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] objected to.

I wish the Members who are not familiar with it would take the other supply bills, not only the District bill, but the other supply bills, and check up and see just how many millions of dollars this Government is appropriating for local matters, nothing in the world but local civic matters. Why, there is nearly $1,000,000 extra that was put into the Interior bill for Howard University above its regular appropriations. That does not come in the District of Columbia appropriation bill; that is in the Interior Department appropriation bill. You will find millions after millions for local matters here in the District of Columbia that do not come out of the District Treasury at all, but come out of the pockets of all the people of the United States. It ought to stop! It ought to stop!

Mr. Chairman, you will not find a single capital of any State of the 48 making up this Union where the rest of the people of the Union pay any part of the civic expenses of that capital. They are paid by taxation of the people who live in the capital, not by the people of the 48 States.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. MAY. How does the public indebtedness of the District of Columbia, as well as the tax rate, compare with the indebtedness and tax rate of municipalities and cities outside the District?

Mr. BLANTON. The District does not have any public indebtedness. The Government of the United States has been paying all the public indebtedness here. Every other city has public indebtedness; but as long as you have a Federal Treasury here with the doors wide open, with hungry, lean, lanky arms always reaching into it, you are not going to have any public indebtedness against Washington people.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman proposes by his amendment to reduce the contribution of the Federal Government exactly $5,000,000, and I want to vote for the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. And if you reduce it $5,000,000, you still will not raise the taxes. The present tax rate here of $1.70 per $100 will produce every dollar they need and you will still have a surplus of possibly $1,500,000 in the treasury, will you not, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CANNON. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. You will still have a surplus of possibly $1,500,000 left in the treasury.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has undertaken to estimate the cost of these pleasure trips that have been made over the country at the expense of the Government?

Mr. BLANTON. I have a few moments ago put this table in the RECORD which shows you exactly what they have amounted to, just for the employees of the District of Columbia city government alone since July 1, 1932.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any particular part in this discussion to-day. I know something of the burdens of handling this bill and I know something of the work that our colleague from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has done on it; I know something of the long hours of labor he has put in and I know just how thankless the task is that he is undertaking to perform. With due regard to all that I want to appeal this afternoon to the House of Representatives to exercise a bit of good, common sense with reference to this bill.

We have gone through this fight year after year. The House of Representatives in this Congress is on record fixing the amount of a fair contribution to the District of Columbia at $6,500,000. This has been done as the basis of a report of a special committee of the House. This Congress adopted the report, as I remember it, unanimously, or almost so. Now, why, in this way, repudiate the action of the Mapes committee and the House of Representatives on this special report?

To say that you can put through a bill in this Congress cutting the Federal contribution for the support of the District of Columbia to $1,500,000 is absurd. Anything like that in this bill will mean the defeat of the bill in this Congress.

I am not one of those, as the House well knows, who shares the idea that the Federal Government ought to contribute a great amount to the support of the District of Columbia, but we ought to be fair. The statement has been made by the gentleman from Texas, and supported by my good friend from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], that if this amendment is put in the bill there will still be a surplus of $1,500,000 in the District treasury. If this is true, why did they not tell the House so in their report? I am reading now from the report of the committee headed by Mr. CANNON at page 3, showing that the gross surplus if this bill is adopted, as written by the committee, will be $5,060,000. But of this amount, according to the report, only $4,329,205 is a general-fund surplus. So that if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] you are automatically creating a deficit in the District treasury and creating a situation that is going to cause discord and turmoil in District finances.

We have had a well-balanced bill. The Federal contribution under this bill, as well as the District set-up, has been such that the revenues of the District have been sufficient and the District has been properly financed; and my appeal now to the House is that you not disturb this balance which has been maintained for these years between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia in this bill.

In passing, my good friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has referred to various expenditures here. They are expenditures that have been made during all the years by the District officials, and I am ready to defend the sending of public officials on public business to get information. Here are the traffic director, the chief of police, and the assessor of the District; and there is not a more public-spirited, self-sacrificing, competent official in the District government than the assessor. These men are not out on junketing trips. They have not been on pleasure trips. They have been out getting themselves better equipped to serve the people of this District, and we should commend them for it. The total expenditures carried by all this tabulation amounts to $3,546.86. This is not an extravagant expenditure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. We do have, in my opinion, in the District of Columbia a government that is as free from graft and is as honest and efficient a government as exists anywhere in the United States and probably is superior to the government of any large city anywhere in this country.

I make this statement after eight years of intimate contact with the officials in the District government. The District Commissioners and the personnel of the District government are honest, efficient, courageous public servants, and they ought not to be questioned with reference to an expenditure of this kind; and I am confident that my friend from Texas did not mean to leave that inference.

Mr. BLANTON. Since the gentleman has mentioned me, will he yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Gladly.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will look in the Herald this morning, he will see the statement that in 1928 the rate was reduced to $1.70 and at that time the District had a surplus of approximately $10,000,000 in the Federal Treasury.

Now, if they can have a surplus of $10,000,000 in 1928, with a tax at $1.70, why can not they have a $6,500,000 surplus in 1933, when property has almost doubled in taxable value since 1928?

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been a material increase in expenditures, largely on the salary rolls.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. HOLADAY. In order to keep the record straight, it may be that some of the items mentioned by the gentleman from Texas are necessary, and some unnecessary, but I want to say that the gentleman from Texas, along with myself, voted for every dollar of those expenditures. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Texas voted for every dollar that has been expended under those items.

Mr. BLANTON. Show me the RECORD.

Mr. HOLADAY. Look at the vote last year when the bill was passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I voted for the big supply bill on final passage, because we had to have a bill, but I never voted for those items.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman voted for all the items in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Just as you vote for the naval bill or the legislative bill—you vote for those bills on final passage, but you don't approve of every item in them.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman can not stand up here and say he did not vote for each and every one of those items in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that is ridiculous. Of course I voted for the supply bill on final passage; but it is just like a conference report—you have to vote it up or vote it down, but you do not vote for everything in the conference report.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I want to make this closing appeal to the House, that it use its common sense in handling this matter. I have gone through this several times. Frankly, I do not believe that the reductions that can be made as the result of the surplus in the District government ought to all go to the credit of the United States. The District taxpayers have contributed their part of it. By this method to credit all the surplus to the United States is in effect to levy a tax on the property of the District of Columbia for the benefit of the United States. To me such a proposal is indefensible. I also believe that before the bill becomes a law the greater part of the surplus referred to will have been expended in necessary appropriations for the District of Columbia. The report shows that there is approximately $4,000,000 in the general fund, approximately half a million dollars in the gasoline fund, and $150,000 in the water fund, and I venture to say that a greater part of it, if not the whole, will be appropriated for expenses in the District of Columbia before this bill becomes a law.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, just such speeches as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has made go out and are printed in the newspapers and cause editorials reflecting upon Congress. I want the RECORD to show that the Federal Government has buildings throughout the entire District for which not one dollar in taxes is collected. Police and fire protection is furnished to the Government for its public buildings. If the people of the country know the situation, do you think upon reflection that they would be heartless enough to ask the residents of the District to bear the entire burden of the cost of government in the district? The contribution of $6,500,000 carried in this bill is for the purpose of paying the share of the Government toward maintaining the Capital of the Nation as it should be maintained. If there have been abuses in administration then eliminate the abuses, but we should not eliminate the aid that the Government has always extended to the District.

I repeat, the people of the United States do not expect the people of the District of Columbia to maintain a city to house Government offices. When they analyze the situation, they will want some contribution to be made toward the expenses of the city by the Government.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] talks about junkets. He puts one side of the matter into the RECORD; and if it is not answered, we will be subject to criticism for letting officials spend money in that way. I ask permission to place in the RECORD at this point a statement by Colonel Grant, and I think this House has confidence in Colonel Grant, in reference to at least one of the junkets.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a certain statement made by Colonel Grant. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, I want this RECORD here to show that these items that I mentioned and the table of trips I inserted are traveling allowances made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Colonel Grant had nothing in the world to do with them. He is a colonel in the United States Army, and is not an officer of the District of Columbia. He is a United States Government officer in charge of Government institutions here wholly disconnected from the Government of the District of Columbia. What Colonel Grant said related only to a little item of $300 for some of his employees to travel. It did not refer to travel of District employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Colonel Grant has control over the spending of about $2,000,000 of this appropriation.

The statement of Colonel Grant follows:

Mr. CANNON. You are also asking, for the first time, an appropriation of $300 for attendance at meetings. Those are national meetings of park officials?

Colonel GRANT. Park officials and technical people of one kind or another connected with our work, such, for instance, as the Park Executives' Institute and the Road Builders' Association.

We have developed, I think, a very good type of road, a very excellent type of road, with the help of the Bureau of Public Roads. Where we have had any money to rebuild an old road, or to build new roads, this type has been so successful that we have had practically no maintenance cost at all on any of the roads that have been rebuilt in that way, or built new in that way, unless there was a slip in the ground. Sometimes we have had slight repairs due to unequal compacting of the ground on which the road was built.

In order that the people who are doing that work should be up to date and know the latest methods and the best ways of saving money, they should be able to come in contact with the people doing the same sort of work from all over the country. They will learn a great deal more for the benefit of the District than the small amount it costs to send them to such meetings, and yet they are not people who are receiving salaries high enough for them to be able to afford to attend such conventions and meetings at their own expense.

Mr. CANNON. How have these expenses been met in former years?

Colonel GRANT. Sometimes, and sometimes not. Sometimes they have taken the money out of their own pockets * * *.

The District bill at the beginning, I think, provides for that sort of thing for the District officials, and it has been understood that that language did not apply to the technical people in my office. This is not an additional appropriation; it is merely an authority to send them for that purpose.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], let me say that on page 515, under the subhead Appropriations for Attendance at Meetings, Colonel Grant testified before the subcommittee, and on the next page what the gentleman refers to will be found.

In regard to the engineers, here is what Mr. Donovan, the auditor, said:

TRAVELING EXPENSES IN ATTENDING CONVENTIONS BY DISTRICT HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT

Mr. DONOVAN. It is being held at Detroit, and the expenses of such District officials in attendance at that meeting, whose expenses are being paid by the District, are paid from the item on page 55 of the bill, where there is an authorization of $4,000.

You have an item of $3,000 for—

"Traveling expenses not to exceed $3,000, including payment of dues and traveling expenses in attending conventions when authorized by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Mr. CANNON. How many are in attendance at this meeting at Detroit?

Mr. DONOVAN. I could not give you that information. But I am pretty certain that the District is not paying Captain Whitehurst's expenses. Mr. Eldridge is also there.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Eldridge is there at the expense of the District?

Mr. DONOVAN. No; at his own expense.

Mr. CANNON. Captain Whitehurst is there at his own expense?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not know about that, but I will check up on that and give you the information in the morning.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

"In regard to the expense of a trip to Detroit made by employees and officials of the District government in January, 1933, the following statement is submitted:

"W. A. Van Duzer, H. C. Whitehurst, and F. M. Davison, paid by American Road Builders' Association.

"H. F. Clemmer, paid by District; estimated cost $100.

"J. N. Robertson and R. L. Bourgeois, paid by District; estimated cost $150."

I know Major Gotwals, the engineer commissioner. He was the United States district engineer for the Engineer Corps of the Army in my city. He is a wonderful commissioner. He was brought to Washington and was appointed engineer commissioner for the District of Columbia, and you all know what an excellent record he has made. You can go all over the United States and you can not find a more capable or honest man or a man that could give better service to the District than Major Gotwals has given. Captain Whitehurst is an excellent man and so is Major Davison. A mistake will be made if men of this type are not retained in their positions. Outstanding public service must be rewarded, and these men are giving that. They did not go to Detroit at the expense of the Government, and it is so stated by Mr. Donovan in the hearings. Still, they went there to get information. They went there to get the latest data on road building. They went there to learn how to construct roads for a less amount than they had been paying. They went there to get information that in the end will be beneficial to the District of Columbia.

I think it would be highly unfair to reduce this appropriation of $6,500,000 to $1,500,000, as the gentleman from Texas suggests. I repeat, the people of this country do not want the people of the District of Columbia to maintain Government offices and space for Government offices and buildings here. In the last few years we have bought an enormous amount of property down here in the Mall on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue on which taxes were being paid to the District of Columbia. When the Government took the property over, the District of Columbia received no more taxes. The people who formerly owned that property paid taxes on it to the District. If I am wrong, I wish some one would correct me.

The assessor of the District of Columbia is responsible for the statement that as of June 30, 1932, the value of Federal property in Washington was estimated at $506,651,848. Not one dollar in taxes is paid upon this outstanding amount. There can be deducted from this amount, however, $144,-305,109, the value of property such as large and small parks dedicated to the use of the District, and also one-half of the water plant. This leaves $362,346,739 for assessment purposes, if the law permitted assessment.

There is the other factor in favor of the District that must not be overlooked. That is whenever the Government purchases property, ground and buildings the District loses the taxes that previously had been paid by the private individual from whom the property was purchased.

At $1.70 a hundred the total holdings of the Government, if owned by private individuals, would pay taxes of $8,337,-608. When property becomes a Government reservation, it does not pay taxes here or elsewhere. You reduce the revenue of the District of Columbia whenever the Government buys a piece of property in the District. If that statement is not so, I would like to have some one correct me. In the absence of a correction I take it I have stated the fact.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. What is the tax rate of the District of Columbia in comparison with cities of the same size?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not know that. I have no knowledge as to that.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is it not a fact that the tax rate of the District of Columbia is lower than that of cities of the same size generally throughout the United States?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I repeat I do not know, but if that is true it is evidence of good management. I do know this, that industries are not invited to the District of Columbia. You do not want industries here—industries that would pay large taxes toward the revenues of the District; in fact, you discourage industries from coming. This is a district set aside for the Capital of the Nation, and it should be looked upon as such and treated as such.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Inasmuch as some reference has been made to the report of the special committee, of which I was a member, I would like to say just a word. This debate here and the situation in which we find ourselves today are fair illustrations of the difficulties involved in trying to adjust the fiscal relations between the Federal and the District Governments. The report of the special committee did not contemplate that the tax rate, already low in the District of Columbia, would be made still lower, as it may be as the result of the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] and sustained, and correctly so, I presume, by the Chair. It may lower a tax rate which is already lower than that of any other like community probably in the United States. The report of the special committee said that for the present the committee thought that a contribution of $6,500,000 per year would be equitable, but it also said that the time might come when it would be fair and reasonable to expect the property and the citizens within the District of Columbia to take care of all of the expenses of the District government.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has discussed the building program within the District of Columbia and the fact that some private property is thereby taken off the assessment rolls. The assessor for the District of Columbia, Mr. Richards, testified that that does not lessen the revenues of the District, but, as a matter of fact, it increases them, because it raises the value of the adjoining property, and the former tenants or owners of the private property that is taken over by the Government have to move into other sections of the District and carry on their businesses in new locations, and that the general effect over a series of years is, as the District assessor testified before the Committee on Appropriation a few years ago, to add to the tax rolls and to add to the tax receipts in the District. So that instead of being a hardship to the residents of the District it is a benefit.

I think it is unfortunate that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] saw fit to make a point of order against the provision which would prevent the District commissioners from fixing a rate below the present rate of $1.70 per $100 or $17 per $1,000 on the assessed valuation of real estate and tangible personal property. No one can claim that that rate is overburdensome when considered in the light of existing economic conditions in the District of Columbia as compared with those throughout the United States outside of the District. I repeat that I think it is unfortunate that the gentleman saw fit to make a point of order against that provision.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman is of course aware of the fact that under the law as it exists now, the commissioners have the power, and it is their duty to fix the tax rate. They can fix it up or down. They can raise it or lower it. That is the present law.

Mr. MAPES. Can they do that regardless of the necessities of the budget?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The law does not say anything about the budget. The law says they must fix a levy that will raise sufficient taxes. The chairman of the committee has shown by his amendment that a reduction of 20 cents will raise sufficient money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. What the gentleman has said is true, with this limitation, as I understand it, that the District Commissioners are required to fix a tax rate that will raise the amount of the budget or appropriations as carried in the appropriation law, but they can not provide for a surplus, as I understand it. This matter of surplus is very largely a matter of bookkeeping. The money goes into the Federal Treasury. It is not earmarked but is paid out of the general fund as required to meet the expenses of the District government. It is very probable that the appropriations in this bill are reduced to a minimum, lower perhaps than the District would be satisfied with in normal times. As soon as we get back to normal conditions the District will be insisting upon additional appropriations, and this tax rate will have to be raised, or the Federal Government will have to contribute a very much larger item than $6,500,000, carried in this bill.

To adjust this matter equitably over a series of years, the $17 per $1,000 ought to be carried in this appropriation bill. If it is not, I do not believe that it is inequitable to reduce the contribution of the Federal Government for this particular year.

I read only yesterday in one of the local papers that while the House passed the report of the select committee, which recommended a contribution of $6,500,000, by subsequent action in adopting the report of the conferees, it raised the amount to $7,775,000 and thereby reversed its former action and established a precedent for a larger contribution. The District people watch every action of the House in this respect and they will cite this action as a precedent and argue that this House believes in a lower rate for the District than the present rate of $17 per $1,000 if the provision as reported by the subcommittee is not carried in this bill as it has been for the last few years.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Answering the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], is it not a fact that the evidence offered before the gentleman's committee in the hearings on the Mapes bills showed that every building which the Government owns here is an asset to the District government? For instance, the Congressional Library, the Lincoln Memorial, the Washington Monument, the $3,000,000 Key Bridge, the $14,000,000 bridge to Arlington, and all of the various important buildings of the Government attract hundreds of thousands of people here as visitors every month in the year who spend millions here. Is that not a fact?

Mr. MAPES. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. MAY. There is some information I would like to have. Can the gentleman tell the House just what percentage of rise in the assessable value of the property of the people of the District of Columbia would be necessary to balance their budget, without any appropriation whatever from the Congress?

Mr. MAPES. I can not give the gentleman the exact figures. It would not have to be raised very much over the present rate to raise the amount appropriated in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this matter of taxation in the District of Columbia as it compares with other communities of like size. I would like it understood that anything I may say with respect to this question of taxation in the District of Columbia is said with the greatest deference to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. I read his very splendid report. I know that no Member of the House, with the possible exception of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], has given more time and more thought and more unselfish study to the troublesome problem of fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia. While I find it necessary to differ sometimes with matters in that report and with some provisions in the pending bill. I do so with the greatest deference, both to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to how the rate prevailing in the District of Columbia compares with the rate prevailing across the river in his own district, for instance?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes. I can do that. I do not know that the rate in my district is typical, but I will be glad to give the gentleman the information. In my home city of Alexandria the tax rate is $2.50. In the District of Columbia the tax rate is $1.70. Gentlemen will say " a much lower rate," but here is the catch in this thing, and I hope the House will recall it: In every community I know of in Virginia, and I imagine it goes throughout the entire country, the assessors, in fixing the valuation of property, assess that property anywhere from 25 to 50 per cent of its market value.

Mr. STAFFORD. In my own city of Milwaukee it is at full value.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Now, what is the result? I would say that a fair average of the whole thing would be that property generally is assessed at about 30 per cent of its actual cash value. A piece of property in the District of Columbia valued at $100,000, at the tax rate of $1.70, would make the taxes on that property $1,700 per annum. Let us assume the property was in some city where the tax was $3. Whereas the taxes on that property in the District of Columbia would be $1,700, assessed upon its full market value, that same property in your State or my State where there is a lower rate of assessment, say, 30 per cent of the market value, would pay a tax of only $1,200.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the property in the District of Columbia is assessed at its full market value?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. At its actual full market value, scientifically ascertained by the assessors.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That was not revealed by the various hearings that have been had before committees.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is revealed by the hearings before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I am a member.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. They do not show that the cost to the Government of this property was up to four or six times its assessed valuation.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am not defending the effort of some individual property owners to try to get more money from the Federal Government for their property than it is fairly worth.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does the gentleman remember a case that came up before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which the gentleman from Virginia is a distinguished member, in which the evidence showed that property owners, believing that the public acquirement of property was coming in their direction, increased their assessments upon their own motion two and one-half times?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I remember the discussion. I remember the gentleman from South Carolina was present. I do not think that has any particular bearing on the question I am now discussing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I would like to yield but also I would like to have some of the time for myself.

Mr. STAFFORD. We will get the gentleman more time. The gentleman has been very active opposing this provision which came from the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can name a city where property is assessed at full value and the rate of taxation is about $2.60 per hundred—my home city. How can the gentleman justify his position when the rate in his own city is much higher?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am not sure I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman stated as his premise, if the gentleman will permit, that in the District of Columbia, the taxation is against the assessed value and that the assessed value is the full value of the property. I said that in my home city of Milwaukee, where the population is about the same as it is in Washington, the assessment is at the full value and the rate of taxation is at least $2.60, and a few years ago, $2.80 per hundred.

How, then, can the gentleman say the people in the District of Columbia are paying higher taxes? And that is the very basis of the comprehensive report made by the distinguished gentleman from Michigan. His committee had an expert compare all these rates, and the finding was that the taxpayers of the District were not paying anything comparable to what taxpayers were paying in other cities of like size.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Now, if the gentleman is through, and I understand that what he has said is put in the form of a question, I shall be pleased to answer it if the gentleman will give me his attention. I assume the gentleman wants me to answer the question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think the gentleman's town is all wrong. If property is assessed at a fair market value, the tax rate is too high.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have not yielded further, I may say to the gentleman. Now, if the people of Milwaukee are paying too high a rate on their property, that is no reason why this Congress should overtax the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not let the gentleman's statement go unchallenged that the people of my city are all wrong. At least, there is one Representative here on the floor of the House who takes the position that he is not all wrong.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman from Virginia understands the gentleman from Wisconsin is working under the Wisconsin system that has practically bankrupted that State.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is acquainted with a condition that is nonexistant.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think the gentleman may very well answer these criticisms by laying the blame at the door of Congress. Congress is responsible for the whole of this situation. Congress, instead of going out, as it should, and getting refusals, or bonding property when it wants to buy a piece of property, advertises that it is in the market to buy that property, and what is the result? The price goes sky-high; it goes up three or four times what it was before.

Congress has burdened the District with 127 bureaus, commissions and officers; and they are trying to do business with 127 different communities, or groups. So the fault is with Congress.

There is a good deal to be laid at the doors of the District itself. I served for eight years on the Committee on the District of Columbia. This is the first time in 12 years' history that I believe the contribution to the District is a fair and equitable one based upon a real investigation of the relations between the District government and the Federal Government.

I know of one instance where a connecting link was wanted between the parkways. That land could have been bought by a private citizen, or by us if we had gone out and bonded it, for $450,000. However, the Committee on Appropriations insisted that Colonel Sherrill should tell them the very land they wanted. The result was that when the property was bought, the Government had to pay $635,000 when it could have been bought for $450,000.

Do not blame the District of Columbia when Congress itself is to blame.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts very much for his contribution.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call this to the attention of the gentleman from Virginia: In the hearings before the Subcommittee on the District of Columbia, at page 337, Mr. Donovan was testifying and said among other things:

The owners would not agree to sell the property at what the District considered to be a reasonable price, and thereupon the commissioners ordered the corporation counsel to institute condemnation proceedings. A verdict was handed down by the first condemnation jury for $105,000. The owner of the property appealed to the Court of Appeals, and the case was thrown out by the Court of Appeals because the assessor was permitted to testify. Thereafter, the case went to a second condemnation jury. The second condemnation jury awarded $294,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia be given five additional minutes, and that he use the time himself. He has very generously yielded to all who have asked him to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to finish this question. Mr. CANNON asked this question:

What is the assessed valuation?

And Mr. Donovan replied:

The assessed valuation, as I recall it, was considerably under $105,000.

This condemnation price was fixed by the people of the District of Columbia who are supposed to know the value of property here, and that is a very good standard to determine whether or not property here is assessed at its actual value or at a very low value.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I do not think that was at all fair, and I agree with the gentleman that that was outrageous and should not have happened; but because some individual has gouged the Federal Government in the sale of his property through a condemnation jury, is no reason why this Congress should not be fair with the taxpayers of the District of Columbia in determining the amount of Federal contribution or the amount of their taxes.

Mr. Chairman, I have before me what seems to be a very pertinent table with respect to taxation per capita in the larger cities of the United States, and I ask unanimous consent to include this in my remarks, as it is very brief.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Per capita tax for calendar year 1933 of certain cities as compiled by the Associated Press and Universal News Service, except for Washington, which figure is for the fiscal year 1933

|---|---|
| New York | $75.00 |
| Boston | 48.00 |
| San Francisco | 65.00 |
| Philadelphia | 57.00 |
| Cleveland | 55.00 |
| Baltimore | 42.00 |
| St. Louis | 46.00 |
| Detroit | 44.00 |
| Chicago | 36.00 |
| Los Angeles | 30.00 |
| Milwaukee | 53.00 |
| Pittsburgh | 31.00 |
| Denver | 24.00 |
| Richmond | 45.00 |
| Kansas City | 47.00 |
| Louisville | 32.00 |
| Houston | 22.00 |
| New Orleans | 17.00 |
| Washington | 67.85 |

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. This was prepared by the Associated Press and the Universal News Service and shows the per capita tax in all the large cities of the United States. The per capita tax for the District of Columbia is $67.85. The only city in the United States that exceeds this per capita tax, so far as shown on this list, is the city of New York, where it is $75 per capita.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. What did the gentleman say was the per capita cost of government in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. This is headed "Per capita tax, $67.85." I do not vouch for the accuracy of it. It was handed to me as having been prepared by the Associated Press and the Universal News Service.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman mean the per capita tax or the per capita cost of government?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It is headed "Per capita tax."

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman also statistics on the cost of government in the various cities?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No; I have not those figures.

May I call the attention of the House to this fact, because I know that the question of fairness in dealing with these matters always appeals to the Membership of the House, and this has already been called to the attention of the House by those who have preceded me on the floor. Every year a large amount of property is withdrawn from local taxation by reason of property being acquired by the Federal Government. This goes on from year to year, and millions and millions of dollars of property in the last two or three years has been withdrawn from local taxation by the acquisition of the Mall property, and this will go on. These properties are in the heart of the city. They are of assessable values, which are the highest in the city; and as this property is withdrawn from taxation, the burden upon the remaining property owners in the city becomes greater. It is, therefore, all the more urgent that a fair and reasonable contribution should be made by the Federal Government to the revenues of the District; and after a most exhaustive study and a most thorough and painstaking study, and I am sure an unprejudiced study, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] in his report recommended as a permanent basis a contribution of $6,500,000; and it seems to me this is a very poor time to undertake to change this in the present Congress.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes, if I have any time remaining.

Mr. MAY. The rate as given by the gentleman from Virginia in his home city of $2.50, as compared with $1.70 in the District of Columbia, leaves a difference of 80 cents on the $100 in the taxable rate of the two cities, with just a river between them. What amount per $100 would be necessary to be raised on the assessed valuation in the District of Columbia, based on the present assessed value of property, to equal the amount of this appropriation that the Congress is proposing to make?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have not those figures.

Mr. MAY. Would it be very materially greater or would it be just an ordinary raise?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have no idea, because I have no figures on that.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the special committee on fiscal relations. Mr. MAPES was the chairman of this special committee. Considerable time was given by this committee to the subject of taxation in the District of Columbia. Prior to this I was a member of the District subcommittee on appropriations for several years. I feel therefore that I am conversant with District matters, particularly the subject of taxation in the District of Columbia.

It is my opinion that real-estate taxes in the District are lower than they are in any other city of comparable size in the United States; also that the taxes collected in the District of Columbia come almost entirely from land taxes. Even in the case of intangibles, the only intangible taxes of consequence collected are taxes from mortgages or deeds of trust on land. Such taxes are listed as intangibles in this District and they are taxed on the basis of $5 per $1,000.

The Mapes committee had a very excellent adviser in the person of Mr. Lord. Mr. Lord is very progressive in his tax views. He is not wedded to the real-estate tax as the proper way to collect taxes, and neither am I, but he was of the opinion that Washington real-estate taxes are lower than the average in cities of comparable size throughout the country.

It is commonly asserted that the property in the District of Columbia is assessed at its real value. The assessor states that property here is assessed at 92 per cent of its real value.

As a matter of truth, it is much less than this, for values are determined by the assessor by taking all sales that are made in a particular locality over a period of time and averaging these sales with the assessment that the other property adjacent to it bears to the sales price. This is about as good a way as one can use, but all of us know that in times like these the sales price of property is no index of value. So if I were going to make a guess, I would say that property in the District of Columbia is assessed at around 60 per cent of its true value, or about the same as property elsewhere, in your State and in mine, is assessed.

Nearly all the States have the constitutional provision that all property shall be assessed at its real or true value, and the assessors in all jurisdictions contend that property is assessed at its true value or thereabouts, and I am sure their statements are believed to be true. I am sure the District assessor is earnestly trying to give to his task the best thought possible and that he is doing his very best.

I believe taxes are too high everywhere. I believe they are too high in the District and much too high elsewhere. They should be reduced, and the correct way to bring about reductions is by lopping off useless expenditures as the splendid chairman of this committee and his associates are doing in their task of writing this bill.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. While as a member of the subcommittee I was not consulted in the actual preparation of the report, and a great many of the items in the bill I knew nothing about, and therefore personally I do not want to be held responsible for the report.

However, this item was informally discussed, and I fully agree with the report on this item prepared by the chairman of the subcommittee.

The Mapes committee, of which I was a member, went very carefully into this question. Mr. MAPES was chairman. Mr. COLLINS, of Mississippi; Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin; Mr. DAVIS, of Tennessee, were members; and they devoted a great deal of attention to this question, and after the most careful investigation they decided that six and one-half million dollars was the proper amount for the United States Government to contribute to the District of Columbia. While my personal opinion might have been a little below that figure, the report was presented to the House, and the bill was passed by the House.

The subcommittee, in placing the figures at $6,500,000, followed what I consider to be the policy laid down by the House. Now, without any consultation, without any basis upon which the amendment should be framed, it is proposed to reduce this appropriation to $1,500,000, which, in my opinion, can not be maintained in any way. I believe it is a mistake to disregard the report of the Mapes committee and disregard the policy of the House and put in the bill a figure which we can not maintain in conference. Therefore, I think the amendment ought not to prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not ask for a division, Mr. Chairman. I realize that it is absolutely impossible to get such an amendment through this Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I demand a division.

The committee divided, and there were 16 ayes and 23 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the figures "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000,000."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment not for the purpose of having an opportunity to speak on it but I want to explain to the membership the fact that I have made a calculation from the committee report of the amount of reduction that the bill will stand and still create an actual balance in the District budget. By the reduction of this amount it leaves a small balance in the treasury.

It is not so drastic as the one on which you have just voted, but merely takes off $2,500,000 from the amount provided in the bill. I do not care to go into the question of the merits of the valuation of the property in the District here by the assessor, or anything of that kind, but it does seem to me, in view of the situation throughout the country, that it is generally known everywhere that municipalities and cities are so heavily involved in debt that they are practically insolvent; that it would be ridiculous before the country for the Congress of the United States to make an appropriation that will create a surplus in the treasury of the District of Columbia merely because the Government happens to own some property in the District. I think it is a question that ought to be approached by every Member of the House in the attitude of an impartial juror. We ought to consider it without prejudice against the District or partiality for the Congress or the Government.

When we do that, and when we have an amendment here that leaves the account balanced, how will you explain to your constitutents when you go back home, when they ask you why it was that you voted a surplus into the treasury of the District of Columbia? You may be able to explain it to yours, but I will not be able to explain it to my constituents, if I should vote for the $6,500,000 carried in the bill. I think upon its face that it ought to be considered and this amendment ought to be agreed to. I think the Government of the District of Columbia ought to be provided with the necessary revenues to operate the Government intelligently and economically, regardless of the values of property, and yet I feel that the people who live in Washington and have homes in Washington and have business property in Washington, have many, many advantages which they can enjoy by reason of the activities of the Government of the United States here that people in the country do not have.

This is the most interesting historic city in the world. We maintain in Washington great historic societies, vast free public libraries, great historic buildings, and numerous other attractions that bring here hundreds of thousands, yea, millions of visitors and tourists from all over America and from foreign countries, and by that the business of the people of the District of Columbia is augmented by multiplied millions. I think that the chairman of the Board of Trade of the District of Columbia on the radio just a few nights ago said that the tourist trade in the District of Columbia, by reason of governmental attractions here, amounted to more than forty million dollars a year. With that increased trade, the profits of which go into the pockets of taxpayers of the District of Columbia, they ought to be glad to go a little further on the question of the increased rate of taxation, and the increased value of their property, with all these advantages at their doors. I think my amendment ought to be agreed to. I am actually in earnest about it, and I shall expect this House, with a view to practicing real, genuine economy, to vote for the amendment, instead of creating a surplus in a treasury that does not need it. Thousands of Government employees live in Washington and receive their pay checks from the Government of the United States every month. There is no missing of pay rolls as is the case in many industrial cities and sections where pay rolls have very largely ceased to exist. Where thousands continue idle and multiplied millions of women and children look to charity for their daily bread, and yet here in Washington the Government by its ever-increasing pay rolls helps to relieve Washington taxpayers of charity obligations, and still Members of this House are willing to vote a surplus into the District treasury while the Federal Treasury has a constantly increasing deficit now running into billions. If you can do this then do it and make atonement to your constituents afterwards if you can.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. In my opinion, the findings of the Mapes committee were wholesome and sound, well supported by indisputable facts, and the committee's recommendations measure the full degree of liability on the part of the District of Columbia.

We should not lose sight of the fact that the District of Columbia was carved out of the wilderness and established as our National Capital. Our constitutional forefathers wisely decided not to locate our Capitol in any of the large cities, but to establish the seat of our Government on the banks of the Potomac, where they believed it would be free from the selfish, sordid, and sinister influences which even at that time dominated Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other important cities.

The Federal Government is not an interloper or a sojourner here in the District of Columbia. Washington has grown to be a great city of nearly half a million population, all as a result of the action of the American people in selecting this particular area as our seat of government. Those who have come to the District of Columbia to live and carry on their various vocations are here at the will and by the sufferance of the Federal Government. Washington is primarily and essentially a Federal city, and the United States Government need not apologize to the people of Washington for its presence here, or for having reared monumental structures to house its multitudinous and far-reaching activities. It is exceedingly ungracious for the people of Washington to complain that the Federal Government pays no taxes on its own property in its own city, which was established primarily as the seat of our Government. The city of Washington owes its prosperity, its beauty, and its accomplishments as a great city solely to the fact that it is the Nation's Capital.

Other than the activities of the Government, there are few commercial, industrial, or business resources to support or maintain the city of Washington and its population. Without the Capitol and the enormous Government pay rolls, this proud city would quickly lose much of its population and many of its stately mansions would be tenanted by bats and owls. What right has the District of Columbia to levy a tax against Federal Government property?

The selection of the District of Columbia as the seat of our Government grew out of political exigencies and emergencies. Before the adoption of our Constitution the Continental Congress met ten times in eight different cities, and in 1783 it was dispersed by riotous soldiers because Congress had failed to grant their demands. Our constitutional forefathers recognized the necessity of establishing our seat of Government far removed from those tumultous and turbulent centers of population; and as the result of a compromise between Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton the Capitol came to the banks of the Potomac.

Conditions here are different from those prevailing in any other capital in the world, except Australia, where a few years ago, on virgin soil and in almost the heart of a wilderness, the city of Canberra was established as the capital of the Commonwealth of Australia. London, Paris, Rome, and Vienna were cities generations or centuries before they became the capitals of their respective nations. But in the District of Columbia we have an essentially national city. The people of the District, instead of being critical and complaining, should at all times be moved by a spirit of profound gratitude for what the Federal Government has done for Washington. The complaint that the properties of the United States are not subject to taxation for District purposes is unjustifiable, ungenerous, and ungracious. The merchants and business and professional groups of the District are beneficiaries of the Nation's bounty and governmental activities.

In a period of unprecedented economic distress throughout the Nation the people of Washington scarcely feel the touch of depression. The pay rolls of the Government always insure prosperity and plenty for the people of the District. Within the last few years a public-building program has been launched in the District of Columbia which, when consummated, will involve the expenditure of approximately $400,000,000. The people of Washington get the benefit of these enormous expenditures of public funds.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Not now. While it is right and proper for the Federal Government to make a reasonable contribution toward the maintenance of the government of the District of Columbia, it is the prerogative of Congress to determine what is a fair and just contribution. Power to pass upon that question is not lodged with the people of the District of Columbia, but it is exclusively a Federal function.

I would not deal in a parsimonious manner with the people of the District of Columbia. I think we should deal generously with them. I would not withhold from the District of Columbia $1 that is justly and fairly due from the United States to the District for the support of the District government. On the other hand, I do not think that we should contribute a sum larger than our just proportion of District expenses.

Following the Civil War, Washington had growing pains and began an aggitation for local self-government, which Congress granted in 1871. The District was given a miniature legislature and allowed to select a full complement of municipal officers. Sinister forces seized the reins, and extravagance, prodigality, and corruption ran riot. Taxes became unbearable. Budgets were in a chronic state of unbalance. The people were exploited. A ruthless political machine ruled with an iron hand, and during this saturnalia of maladministration the proud Capital of the Nation was dominated by a political boss, Mr. Sheppard, whose statue stands in front of the District Building at the other end of the Avenue. These untoward and intolerable conditions soon satiated the artificially stimulated appetite of the people of Washington for local self-government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. So when the District of Columbia was given local self-government it made a sorry mess of its opportunities. After six or seven years of local self-government the people of Washington petitioned Congress to again take over the administration of the affairs of the District.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. In just a moment.

The pending bill makes a fair, just, and reasonable contribution to the expenses of the District of Columbia. It would be unfair to increase this appropriation. It would, in my opinion, be unjust to reduce it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman has given quite an interesting historic statement as to the old existence of the governments of the District of Columbia, but can the gentleman tell the House any reason that will justify this Congress for voting a surplus into the treasury of the District of Columbia when the Federal Government is in the financial condition it is in, and the municipalities of every State in America are insolvent?

Mr. LOZIER. If $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 is a fair and just contribution of the Federal Government to the expenses of the District of Columbia it ought to be paid without regard to whether or not the District of Columbia has a surplus or has a deficit. In other words, if five or six million dollars is what we should pay for the support of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, we ought to pay it, whether the District has a surplus of $5 or $5,000,000. The financial ease of a creditor does not relieve the debtor of the obligations to pay his just obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, every argument previously given to the House by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] would stand in opposition to this amendment as they did to the other. I know of no two men in the House who are better qualified to speak on this subject than those two gentlemen, and I know of no other two gentlemen in the House at the present time, and only one in the last several years, who has ever received the amount of abuse that those two gentlemen have, from the newspapers of the District of Columbia, because of their penurious attitude toward the District of Columbia. If they say the present report is fair and square to the District, I do not think anyone should question it in the least, because they certainly, in years gone by, have stood steadfast in the protection of the Federal Government. There is only one other man, and that was Mr. Cramton, of Michigan, who has ever been abused as those two men have, because he had tried, as they had, to bring to the District an equitable, fair, and just contribution from the Federal Government, based upon an investigation of the facts.

It was Mr. Cramton and myself who first introduced to this House a bill for the lump-sum appropriation to the District of Columbia, instead of the old idea of a 50-50 or 40-60 proposition. As I said a few moments ago, the Congress is largely to blame for the situation that exists in the District. It has burdened the District with a great deal of expense, but at the same time, as the gentleman from Missouri has said, it is because of the integrity of the Government in the District that the taxes are so low.

I know of no other city where there are less charges of graft or corruption or where there is more honest administration of public affairs than there is in the District of Columbia. Oh, they make mistakes; they make errors, but they do not begin to make the mistakes and errors that Congress has made. We are continually burdening the District. Take the triangle, for instance. I would like to get this into the RECORD just as an illustration of the shortsightedness of Congress. I introduced a bill for the purchase of the triangle many years ago. At that time the entire property was assessed for something like $7,500,000. The House listened to me and were very generous in their support of the proposition, but they did not pass the bill. They did pass a bill, however, for the building of a bridge costing $15,000,000. What was the result? An immediate increase of the valuation of the property on the triangle, because of the approaches to the bridge. There was an increase in valuation of over $1,500,000.

I tried when that bridge bill came in, by way of an amendment, to secure the purchase of this property that was then assessed for $8,500,000 or $9,000,000. I failed on a point of order. Later on, when the House passed the so-called Underhill bill for the purchase of the triangle, the whole property could have been bought for less than $23,000,000. The Senate turned it down. The very man who opposed the proposition at that time, afterwards secured passage through the Senate of a bill under his own name, the triangle bill, at an expense of over $37,000,000. That covered a period of less than five years. You see what it cost the people of the United States because of the shortsightedness of Congress and because of the inability of another body to see the necessity for the purchase of this land.

This is the first time I have ever taken the floor in defense of the District. I served for over eight years on that committee and I tried during all that time to bring about an equitable adjustment of the amount of contribution there should be on the part of the Federal Government to the District government. This is the first time there has ever been anything scientific about it. This is the first time it was based upon a study of the situation; and we paid over $15,000 for the expenses of this committee which studied the situation, and now we are going to throw their findings into the waste basket. I think it is a very unfair and unwise proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute, to strike out "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000,000."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MAY: Page 2, line 7, strike out "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky must not fool himself into thinking that he is going to pass his amendment, because he is not; and I am not fooling myself into thinking that my amendment is going to pass.

There is not a chance in the world in this Congress to change this situation in Washington. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has just admitted to you here on the floor that if his first bill on that triangle had been passed, the property could have been bought by the Government for $7,000,000. He then told you that when Congress finally did pass the bill the land cost the Government $37,000,000. In other words, the people owning that property here in Washington charged the Government an extra $30,000,000 for putting in all this improvement; they held up the Government for another $30,000,000 profit. Washington has thus mulcted the Government on all occasions.

The great trouble is that most of the Members who speak here on District matters do not understand the facts or the situation like my friend from Nebraska, BOB SIMMONS; they do not understand the situation like my friend from Michigan, Mr. MAPES; they do not understand the situation like my friend from Missouri, Mr. CANNON, who has made an exhaustive study of it. They merely guess at it, and guess wrong most of the time.

Why, my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. UNDERHILL, yesterday made a statement on the floor of the House indicating that the House library was not used, and he thought he was telling the truth. He asked, "How many Members of the House know there is a House library?" And then he said there is one "down in the basement of the House Office Building." It is not in the basement. It is on the first floor.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). The gentleman from Massachusetts will state the point of order.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to the subject matter of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The rules of the House provide that all motions shall be in writing.

Mr. BLANTON. Not this motion.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; all motions. The gentleman should have his motion in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were—ayes 26, noes 42.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in writing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, lines 1 and 2, strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. In addition to being in writing should not the motion to strike out the enacting clause state after the words striking out the enacting clause that the committee shall rise and report the bill back to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the proper motion is that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken from the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Texas is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Effective for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall increase the rate of taxation on intangible personal property to a rate which is $1 per thousand more than the rate in effect on such property during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and the proceeds from such additional levy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia in a special fund to be designated the "District of Columbia emergency relief fund, 1934," and such fund shall be available to meet expenditures under the appropriation for emergency relief hereinafter provided. Pending the collection of the revenues from such additional levy there may be transferred to such fund from other revenues of the District of Columbia such amounts as may be necessary to meet expenditures currently chargeable to the fund; such advances shall be repaid from such fund as soon as tax collections under such levy are available and the total amount expended from the fund in no event shall exceed the aggregate of the amounts to be collected from such additional levy on intangible personal property.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the proper procedure is first to dispose of the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The basis of my point of order is that the language changes existing law and, in consequence, is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly the section is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, in order to be able to correct the matter which I know the gentleman from Massachusetts wants corrected, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for three minutes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I stated I wanted this bill disposed of. If the gentleman will confine himself to questions under the bill, I am perfectly willing he go on for half an hour, but I do not think he ought to take time on some other subject matter.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to correct a statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Must not the motion carry with it the statement that the committee now rise?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion so provides.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman overlooked that part of it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is the gentleman from Texas under the motion obliged to confine himself to a discussion of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas must discuss the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to direct my few remarks to the part of the bill that embraces the library system here in the District of Columbia. The gentleman from Massachusetts attempted to speak yesterday on the library system——

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the library in the House Office Building is not under the jurisdiction of the District and has nothing to do with the matter contained in this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. O Mr. Chairman, there is always latitude allowed in debate.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Texas will point out where the library is included in the bill, the statement will be in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have the right to discuss the whole bill and anything in it. On page 9 I direct the Chair's attention to the "free Public Library and for books and periodicals and newspapers and other printed material" and all the paragraph that follows there for several pages.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that pertains to libraries of the District of Columbia, and not the House library or the Congressional Library.

Mr. BLANTON. It applies to the library service here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe it applies to the Library of Congress, because that is an entirely different appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to discuss these items of the library in the District of Columbia in connection with the usual rules of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have in this bill quite an appropriation for library service. It embraces not only the main library on New York Avenue, but also embraces all of the many branch libraries. We passed a bill here the other day for additional librarians in the schools. There is a system here of interchange of books between all of these libraries, including the Congressional Library, the Supreme Court library, and the library we have here, as well as the library over on the first floor of the House Office Building.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman is off on his facts, and I want to put him right.

Mr. BLANTON. Yesterday our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] was off on his facts when referring to the library in the House Office Building.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that I referred on yesterday to the House Office Building library and to none of the District libraries, and I object to having my name connected with any such suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe the point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] asked yesterday, "How many Members know there is a library in the House Office Building?" He said there was not 1 per cent of them who had ever obtained any books there, and lo and behold, on yesterday at that very time this library had 137 Congressmen charged with books they had not yet returned.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will a point of order lie now?

The CHAIRMAN. A proper point of order will always lie. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object to the remarks of the gentleman as they do not concern the bill under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the bill and to the libraries mentioned in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, there is an interchange of books between all these libraries in the District, and I have here the names of 137 Congressmen who yesterday had books they had not yet returned charged against their names from this library in the House Office Building.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. That is all I wanted to say. The gentleman just missed it—137 Congressmen who yesterday had unreturned books charged against them in that library—137 of them.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am through. I just wanted to correct the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], and it was a lot of trouble to get to correct the statement he made, but I have now corrected it.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman from Texas mean to say that the libraries around here are open to the people of the District of Columbia and yet we are expected to make an appropriation for their government of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 in addition to that?

Mr. BLANTON. This Government has been spending millions of dollars annually for the people of Washington, and it is a tremendous job to get it stopped. But referring again to this House Office Library, our Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. OSIAS] had books charged against him yesterday, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] made his speech. Our Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico [Mr. PESQUERA] had books charged against him yesterday in that library. Our Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands [Mr. GUEVARA] had books charged against him in that library yesterday. There were nine committees of this House that had books charged against them in that library when Mr. UNDERHILL spoke yesterday. The legislative service had books charged against them in that library yesterday. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], I am afraid, lately, has become like the ostrich, who buries its head in the sand and does not know what is going on around him.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; always.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Could they not get all those books from the Congressional Library or from the House library?

Mr. BLANTON. Possibly. They prefer, however, to get them from this special-service library that looks up special references for them and gathers statistics for them. They are using something that if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] would use also, his information would be more authentic and correct.

I do not like for the gentleman from Massachusetts to malign the former Speaker of this House. The gentleman said he went to the Speaker three or four years ago and the Speaker told him he did not know there was such a library over there. I am sure the then Speaker must have been better informed on such matters, for the present Speaker had books from this library charged against his office as not yet returned when the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke yesterday.

I want to say if there is any other Member here like my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], who does not know the value of that library over in the House Office Building, he ought to go over there and get acquainted with it. It will be helpful to him in his work here. You not only can get books there but you can have them look back through the records and procure valuable data for you, just like I sent over there and got a list of the names of Congressmen now using their books from them. I have got a list of the 137 Congressmen who yesterday had unreturned books charged to them at the very time the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] stated in the RECORD that not 1 per cent of the Members here knew there was a library there.

The House having granted me consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am going to put these names of these Members furnished me by said library in the RECORD just to show my friend from Massachusetts how far off the facts he was yesterday, and just to show how many statements are made here from time to time when Members have not investigated and do not know what are the real facts.

It so happens that on yesterday when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] asked the question, "How many Members of this House know there is a House library?" and he stated, "I doubt if 1 per cent of the Members ever were in it or ever got a book from it," as shown on page 4069 of yesterday's RECORD, this same little library on the first floor of the House Office Building then, at that very time, had 137 Congressmen charged with books not yet returned, and then had eight big committees and the Speaker's office, and the Clerk of the House, and the Legislative Counsel's office, and Hon. William Tyler Page, our former Clerk of the House, all charged with books not yet returned. It then had the Ways and Means Committee, the Judiciary Committee, the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Revision of Taxes, the Naval Affairs Committee, the Committee on Patents, the Committee on Immigration, and the Commitee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce all charged with books not yet returned. The Members of Congress who on yesterday were charged on the books of this library with having books out that they have not yet returned are the following, whose names have been furnished me by said library, to wit: LAGUARDIA, MALONEY, BOEHNE, BLACK of New York, FRED M. VINSON, LOZIER, LANKFORD, GIFFORD, MARVIN JONES, SWANK, SCHAFER, A. T. SMITH, WITHROW, Mrs. OWENS, CAMPBELL of Iowa, CARTWRIGHT, BLANTON, WASON of New Hampshire, POU, MCSWAIN, HARE, CRAIL, KNUTSON, SABATH, KUNZ, RANDELL, H. W. SMITH, CLARK of Missouri, DISNEY, MAY, SMITH of West Virginia, ALMON, SANDERS, BLOOM, MANSFIELD, MAPES, GUINN WILLIAMS, DONALD SNOW, PETTENGILL, RANKIN, HARDY, PARKER of New York, PEARSON of Illinois, TINKHAM, MCCORMACK, LEWIS, EATON of Colorado, SEIBERLING, SOMERS of New York, BOLAND, GARBER, BRAND of Georgia, COLTON, HOGG of West Virginia, CROSS, WOLVERTON, PEAVEY, PATMAN, REED of New York, DREWRY, RAINEY, CABLE, WICKERSHAM, DICKSTEIN, SANDERS of Texas, MICHENER, HESS, HANCOCK of North Carolina, WILLIAM E. HULL, COLLINS of Mississippi, GRANFIELD, GILCHRIST, CONNOLLY, DOUGLAS, HOPE, CLARK of North Carolina, SIMMONS, KOPP, HASTINGS, KARCH, GRISWOLD, CELLER, MONTAGUE, SWANK, GAMBRILL, KETCHAM, MOUSER, REID of Illinois, SMITH of Virginia, HOUSTON, HARLAN, SCHNEIDER, MCKEOWN, MEAD, COX, RAGON, COOKE, BOILEAU, WRIGHT, SWING, DOUGHTON, WARREN, LUDLOW, RUTHERFORD, NORTON of New Jersey, MILLER, BACON, GIBSON, BEEDY, BUCHANAN, GRIFFIN, BUSBY, TAYLOR, PATTERSON, O'CONNOR, AMLIE, CHAVEZ, PALMISANO, SNELL, GAMBRILL, STRONG, STEVENSON, CHAPMAN, GUEVARA, RAMSEYER, COCHRAN of Missouri, BROWNING, LAMBERTSON, BOYLAN, and a number of former colleagues, such as Snyder, Crisp, and others. That is a pretty fair cross section of our Members here.

The above will explain, also just why such a strenuous effort was made to keep me from speaking, and to keep me from making this proper correction. This is one of the greatest public forums in the world. A Representative of the people can always find a way to be heard, if he knows the rules, and frivolous points of order can not crush him, and can not keep him from presenting his facts, if he will use the rules of the House, and bide his time. The gentlemen who tried to gag me, and who tried to obstruct me, and to keep me from presenting the facts, merely wasted their own time and efforts, and did not suppress anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was pro forma, and I withdraw the motion.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman from Texas withdrawing the motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not even going to vote for my own motion.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the motion. While I do not always agree with the gentleman from Texas, on this occasion I am glad, as a minority member of the subcommittee, to join with the majority member in this motion to strike out the enacting clause, which will allow the whole matter to go back to the committee for further consideration, which I believe is desirable.

I believe this bill has been ill considered, and I heartily agree with the gentleman from Texas that it is a desirable thing that it be sent back to the committee for further consideration. Therefore, I am glad to support his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were 48 ayes and 63 noes.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 2, after line 10, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"PUBLIC WELFARE

"Emergency relief of residents, District of Columbia: For the purpose of affording relief to residents of the District of Columbia who are unemployed or otherwise in distress because of the existing emergency, to be expended by the Board of Public Welfare of the District of Columbia, by loan, employment, and/or direct relief, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Board of Commissioners, and without regard to the provisions of any other law, payable from the revenues of the District of Columbia, fiscal year 1934, $625,000: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 of this appropriation shall be available for administrative expenses including necessary personal services."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proposed amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order at this place in the bill. It is not germane to this particular section. It comes under the head of public welfare, and if it is germane at all, it should be offered at page 64.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I will withdraw it for the present and let it lie on the desk and offer it at the proper place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not germane at this point in the bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the foHowing amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the figures "$6,500,000" and insert "$3,500,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph is still pending.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chair indulge me a moment? The point of order is that amendments to the first paragraph which have been presented should have been presented before the reading of the second paragraph which began on line 14, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct, and the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used for or in connection with the preparation, issuance, publication, or enforcement of any regulation or order of the Public Utilities Commission requiring the installation of meters in taxicabs: Provided, That this prohibition shall not be construed to affect any order or part of an order of such Public Utilities Commission other than with respect to the requirement of the installation of such meters.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this paragraph for the reason that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. The Public Utilities Commission here apparently has a combined executive and administrative function. This paragraph imposes such a limitation, particularly the last portion thereof, that it becomes an affirmative direction to an executive branch of the Government. The law involved is set forth in Thirty-seven Statutes, page 992, paragraph 88.

Mr. CANNON. Is the point of order against the entire paragraph, or merely against the proviso?

Mr. HARLAN. The point of order is against the entire paragraph, my position being that the proviso vitiates the entire paragraph.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. It seems to me that that portion of the paragraph contained in lines 14, 15, 16, and 17 and a portion of 18, down to the taxicab provision, is not subject to the point of order, but that the proviso is. If the gentleman makes the point of order on the paragraph, the committee can reoffer the first portion of it, and then the whole order would be void. I know that the gentleman does not want to do that. I am sure the committee can offer an amendment to make it in order, and then, with the proviso knocked out, it will work a hardship and would not be antagonistic to meter taxicabs.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The whole paragraph is clearly a limitation and it has been held to be a limitation.

Mr. HARLAN. Oh, the gentleman can get recognition to present his argument in his own time I imagine. Paragraph 88 of the act of March 13, 1913, Thirty-seventh Statutes, specifically grants and directs the Public Utilities Commission to provide regulations for rates controlling taxicabs. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has passed upon that paragraph and declared that it is within the power of this commission to pass this taxicab regulation. It is my contention, first, that the first part of the paragraph so limits the action of the Public Utilities Commission that it vitiates the power already granted to them in this act, and that the second part, from the proviso down, is such a limitation as to become a direction to the Public Utilities Commission in their functions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a limitation. It complies with every requirement of the unwritten rule that has been in force since the days of Jefferson.

It is a limitation, pure and simple, and the proviso to which the gentleman refers merely restricts the application of the limitation. The limitation would be more comprehensive without the proviso, and the last section of the paragraph only adds to its immunity. It is clearly a limitation upon an appropriation bill, and the gentleman's point of order is not well taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Chair to indulge me while I present an argument to uphold the position that the paragraph violates the rule against legislation on an appropriation bill, and that applies not only to the proviso, but also to the main part of the paragraph. I have high regard for the parliamentary attainments of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who has charge of the bill, and who at one time was parliamentary adviser to the late Speaker, Mr. Champ Clark.

This provision was not contested when the bill was under consideration a year ago, as I recall. I take it that the present occupant of the chair has some general knowledge of the rule of limitations. I invite the chairman's attention to an exhaustive ruling made by the chairman of the committee, former Representative Frederick C. Hicks, on January 8, 1923, when he reviewed all of the decisions relating to limitations. This paragraph infringes the rule for the reason that it impairs and intrudes upon the right and the power of the Utilities Commission to determine how they shall exercise their functions. The authority which is vested in the Utilities Commission over these taxicabs is found in paragraph 88, which has been called to the attention of the Chair by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN]. It reads as follows:

That whenever, after hearing and investigation, as provided in this section, the commission shall find that any rate, toll, charge, regulation, or practice of any public utility in the District is unreasonable or discriminatory, it shall have the power to regulate, fix, and determine the same as provided in this section.

There is nothing in that paragraph which says how the Utilities Commission shall exercise its authority over these taxicabs, and yet the committee here is attempting to tell the Utilities Commission how it shall exercise its authority, by forbidding it from enforcing one of its orders in respect to taxicabs.

I briefly now advert to one or two of the excerpts referred to in that elaborate opinion, delivered by former Representative Hicks, as found in section 953 of the manual. Among others he refers to paragraph 3967, IV Hinds' Precedents, in which this language is used:

A limitation is negative in its nature and may not include positive enactments establishing rules for executive officers.

This limitation here establishes a positive direction as to how the utilities commission may exercise the functions vested in it by Congress and to that extent it is legislative. I am not referring to the matter contained in the proviso, but I am referring to the main inhibition forbidding the utilities commission from exercising its right and power to determine how it shall enforce its determination of the regulation of taxicabs in this District.

Further, from section 3966, IV Hinds' Precedents:

Limitations which directly, or indirectly, vest in any executive officer any discretion or impose any duty upon the officer, directly or indirectly, in the expenditure of money, would be obnoxious.

Then also paragraph 3936, IV Hinds' Precedents:

The fact that a paragraph on an appropriation bill would constitute legislation for only a year does not make it admissible as a limitation.

Further, 3942, IV Hinds' Precedents:

While it is not in order to legislate as to qualifications of the recipients of an appropriation, the House may specify that no part of the appropriation shall go to recipients lacking certain qualifications.

Then he refers to a decision rendered by Mr. Speaker Cannon and pays high compliment to Mr. Cannon for this decision, as the Speaker was then in the House, but many years removed from the time when he delivered the opinion.

May I say for the benefit of the parliamentary clerk and also the occupant of the Chair, that the opinions of Speaker Cannon, in almost every instance during the four terms he was Speaker, during which time I had the honor to serve as a Member here, were prepared at the instance of that great Parliamentarian, Asher D. Hinds, who has compiled these precedents? This is what Speaker Cannon stated at that time, construing what is in order on limitations and what is not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to allow the gentleman from Texas, after he has used so much time to-day, to take me off the floor. It rests with the Chair whether he wishes to hear me or not, and not with the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The rules permit me to ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman. That leaves it to the discretion of the Chair as to whether he wants to hear further argument.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has no right. I am proceeding in order. If the gentleman does not know that much parliamentary law after his long service here, he ought to be told that it is in the indulgence of the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will lose his temper if he does not be careful. If the Chair can stand further argument, we can likewise.

Mr. STAFFORD. No. I am not losing my temper. I am trying to acquaint the gentleman from Texas with the first elements of parliamentary law, with which he seems to be entirely unacquainted.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's breakfast did not set well, apparently. The ruling of the Chair on the point of order will determine the extent of our parliamentary knowledge.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I just had a beefsteak and a good cup of tea, and I am in fighting mood. I paid a dollar for it, too. [Laughter.]

If a limitation, whether it be affirmative or negative, operates to change law or to enact law in effect, then it is subject to the rule that prohibits legislation upon a general appropriation bill.

This limitation infringes on the discretion of the Utilities Commission in the way it shall properly function in determining how it shall carry on the general powers, as provided in paragraph 88 of the Public Utilities Commission law, which provides that—

Whenever, after hearing and investigation as provided in this section, the commission shall find that any rate, toll, or regulation * * *.

It is an attempt by direction, not by indirection, to tell the commission it can not exercise its full authority, which that general law vests in the commission so to do.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not want to intrude on the gentleman's argument, but further in that same opinion the Speaker held that no matter how artful the amendment may be drawn we must look to the purpose back of the amendment as well as to the express words in which the amendment is drawn.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will read merely that paragraph which is in the summary of the Chairman's opinion:

Is the limitation accompanied or coupled with a phrase applying to official functions, and, if so, does the phrase give affirmative directions in fact or in effect, although not in form?

I respectfully contend, after giving this subject some consideration at the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN], who made the point of order, that this is violative of the rule of limitations, in that it attempts to curtail and impair the full discretion of the commission in the exercise of its general powers in the regulation of taxicabs.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in all due deference to the position taken by my good friend from Wisconsin, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that there is not a single word of affirmative direction in this provision. It in no way seeks to curtail or impair the rights, authority, prerogatives, or activities of the commission. So far as this paragraph is concerned, the commission may go ahead and take any action it deems wise or do anything in the world it wants to do. The only thing we say in this provision of the bill is that if they do of their own volition take certain designated action it can not be paid for out of the funds provided by this bill. It is merely a limitation, Mr. Chairman, and there is no other interpretation that can be placed on it, and the point of order does not lie.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PRALL). The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair does not believe that the paragraph interferes with the power of the Utilities Commission. The Chair believes that the limitation is proper in that it is merely a restriction upon the use of the money appropriated.

Further, the Chair would like to quote from a ruling of Chairman SNELL on January 18, 1930, in which he said:

A negative restriction on the use of money appropriated in a bill or proposed to a bill in the form of an amendment is a limitation and in order.

He further states:

A limitation on the use of money appropriated may change existing law to the extent of forbidding the use of the money for the propositions that are authorized by law, and in such form is in order.

The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HARLAN: Page 7, line 14, strike out all of line 14 to and including line 21.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment involved would permit the Utilities Commission to proceed with the regulations which they adopted a few years ago. That regulation has been attacked in the courts. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia approved not only the legal side of that regulation but also the factual necessity of such regulation.

In this District there are at the present time something like 6,000 taxicabs roaming about the city. Forty per cent of their mileage is consumed in occupying the streets and blockading necessary traffic. Last year there were 8,000 traffic accidents in the city of Washington—almost a disgrace. There was an average of 10 deaths a month in this city, the Capital of the United States.

In 1931 there were 1,725 accidents involving taxicabs alone. Others involved general traffic, but those accidents are due to the crowded condition of our streets, which is absolutely needless. We do not need that. We can have just as good service. The regulation of the Utilities Commission puts a charge of 25 cents for a 2-mile ride, 5 cents more than we pay now. It would permit insurance. It would permit those men to keep their cabs in repair; it would permit them to keep their brakes in good condition. It would permit them to keep them clean. All of the things that we have been calling for on the floor of the House that are needed at an additional charge of 5 cents.

Mr. Chairman, the average ride in the District is less than 2 miles. We have a zoning ordinance here that allows a person riding in one direction to go 7 miles for 20 cents, but in another direction if he rides half a mile it will cost him 60 cents.

The Utilities Commission have tried for years to get some kind of a sensible fare-zoning ordinance, but it can not be done, and the court says that it can not be done.

The gentlemen who oppose this regulation say they are doing it on behalf of the poor soldier boys who are making a living driving cabs. When this matter was before the Utilities Commission only one driver appeared favoring it. The men do not want it. They want to have a chance to charge a fare under which they can give good service and make a livelihood.

The testimony before the committee showed that some men were working 18 hours a day. One man testified that he had worked 20 hours out of the previous 24, trying to eke out a bare living. Your children and my children are walking the streets of Washington facing the hazard of drivers who have worked 18 and 20 hours at a stretch. We should protect their safety in crossing the streets.

Eight thousand accidents in one year is too much to pay in order to save 5 cents fare. It is nothing but money saved out of the blood of the citizens of Washington, yet we come in here without any real consideration at all and write this restriction into this bill as legislation.

Let me read the statement of a justice of the supreme court. This is not a statement from the Public Utilities Commission, but this is a statement made by the judge of the supreme court who passed on this question:

> In my judgment, the zone system has been possible only through the exploitation of labor. Under the system the owner furnishes a new car to the driver at a rental paid each day. Men are compelled to work from 12 to 16 hours daily or be supplanted by some one else.

We can not impose insurance, Mr. Chairman, unless we give these taxicab drivers enough funds to pay for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there are two interests in Washington that want meters. One is the street-railway companies that have been robbing the people, charging them a big fare nearly double that authorized by their charters, until the people have rebelled and stopped riding on their street cars; they want to stop this cheap taxicab service so the people will be forced to ride on their street cars again. The other interest is the big Diamond cab organization and the Black and White and Yellow monopoly. If Brother WOOD and I, notwithstanding he has been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and has been an honored Member of Congress for years and has been at the head of the Republican organization here, if he and I were to go over to the Union Station now driving our own car we could not drive in next to the building, we would have to get out about the second or third driveway and climb in between all those Yellow and Black and White taxicabs, because they still have a monopoly at that Union Station. They are the ones who are trying to run the independent taxicabs off the streets of Washington; and how on earth they got in here and persuaded some of our friends to back them up I can not understand.

Mr. HOLADAY. Not the Diamond.

Mr. BLANTON. The Diamond is one of them. The Diamond is becoming one of the biggest and most autocratic taxi organizations in Washington.

Mr. HOLADAY. It is an organization made up of independent owners.

Mr. BLANTON. But they are now in the monopoly class, and in favor of putting meters on the taxicabs to ruin the independents. They, the Yellow cabs, and the Black and White cabs want to run every real independent off the street.

Let me tell you what we have involved here. We have 1,500 ex-service men who went to France, who served their country in the World War, who are driving taxicabs right now in Washington, making a living for their families here in the Nation's Capital; and until they got to driving their taxis their wives and children were hungry, without shelter to cover their heads, and with no means of getting food. Fifteen hundred of them are making a living now. They tell me they make from $3 to $8 per day and that they are satisfied.

Read the hearings and see what General Patrick said. See what will happen if you strike out this provision. General Patrick appeared before the committee and in substance said:

> Gentlemen, if you fail to put that limitation back in the bill I am going to put meters on the cabs.

He said it in the hearings.

I said:

> General, when you know the House passed this limitation unanimously, and when you know the Senate passed it unanimously, when you know it is the expressed will of Congress not to have meters put in cabs in Washington to run the independents off the street, why not be a good sport and enter into a gentleman's agreement with this committee not to put meters in the cabs, so that when we go home we will not be afraid you will do it in our absence?

He said:

> If you do not put that limitation in the bill, I am going to put meters in the taxis.

After he found out we were going to put it in—the committee voted on it right there—he came around to my office and said:

> I will make the gentleman's agreement with the committee.

It was too late.

Within the last 10 days three of my friends, one gentleman from Hanover, Pa., and two from Texas, were charged 75 cents apiece for riding from the Union Depot to the Willard and Washington Hotels.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has had his time.

Mr. HARLAN. I merely wished to state that that is one of the reasons why cabs should have meters in them.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it is not. Just the reverse. People coming to Washington, not knowing there is a 20-cent zone system, take a cab to a hotel, then ask the driver how much they owe him, and he says, "Seventy-five cents"; and they do not argue with him but pay the holdup.

If you strike out this provision and let General Patrick put meters back on these cabs, every time you ride from this Capitol to some hotel in the downtown district you will be charged 75 cents; and you will pay him rather than have a fuss with him, even though you know it ought not to be more than a quarter. Are you going to let your constituents come to Washington and be robbed by those cabs? They will ride from the station to the Roosevelt or Wardman Park Hotels, ask the driver how much they owe him, and he will tell them a dollar and a quarter. They are not going to fight the cab driver on the street but they will pay the dollar and a quarter. That is exactly what will happen if you strike out this provision.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The gentleman from Texas is in error when he makes the statement that we are going to put the veterans off the streets.

This morning I rode to the House of Representatives in a taxi. I spoke to the driver. He told me it cost him $3 a day for the rental of his cab. He worked 14 hours yesterday and his total receipts were something like $5.

He paid nearly one dollar for gas; he paid $3 for rental of the taxi, and his net income for working 14 hours yesterday was $1.

Surely it is not a fair proposition to have men working 14 hours a day on the streets of Washington for $1. Surely the gentleman is again in error when he says that you could take a taxi at the Capitol and go to any of the hotels and pay 75 cents. Why is he in error? He is in error according to the figures I put in yesterday's RECORD, which show that the first drop is 25 cents and for that 25 cents you can go 2 miles under the rate fixed by the Utilities Commission. You can reach any of the hotels in Washington from the Capitol, practically, within a radius of 2 miles.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Our friend sitting right here [Mr. McSWAIN], who is the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and a prominent Member of the Congress, whom we all love, told me a moment ago that last night a taxi driver charged him 65 cents and not the 20 cents others charge, and he paid it because he did not want to have an argument with the cab driver.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman should know that the Utility Commission's rates are not in effect. That is what I am trying to explain to the gentleman. Mr. McSWAIN paid the old rates.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but if you put in the meters, when you get out of the cab and they tell you the charge is $1.25, you will pay the $1.25 or have a fight. And you had rather pay it.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman speaks of meters that are installed under the old system. That is why I want some regulation. There is now no regulation. These meters that are now in are meters that were installed three or four years ago and they do not register the rates as provided by the Public Utilities Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose we adopt this new meter system, beginning with the initial charge of 25 cents, and my friend from New York, who is very peaceful, gets into a taxicab and drives out to the Roosevelt Hotel, within the 25-cent limit, and gets out expecting to pay 25 cents and hands the driver 25 cents and the driver says, "You owe me $1.25," and you say, "There is a 25-cent meter system here," and he says, "Pay me $1.25." the gentleman will pay him the $1.25 rather than have a brawl.

Mr. BOYLAN. Can I not get the gentleman out of the error of his way? Is the gentleman so "sot" in his ways that he will not see the light?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I know these things from a practical standpoint and not from a theoretical standpoint. After you put in meters authorizing 25 cents, they will hold you up for $1.25 whenever you do away with the 20-cent zone system.

Mr. BOYLAN. But the gentleman persists in quoting the rates formerly fixed on the meters. They are the rates that are in force now, and not the new rates as proposed by the Public Utilities Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. But suppose you put in the meters authorizing a new rate of 25 cents and you go from here to the Roosevelt Hotel and the gentleman gets out of the car and hands the driver a quarter and he says, "Pay me a dollar and a quarter," what is the gentleman going to do? Argue that it should be 25 cents? No; he will not get in a brawl. He will pay the $1.25 demanded.

Mr. BOYLAN. That is ridiculous because the meter would only register 25 cents under the new schedule.

Mr. BLANTON. How does the gentleman know. It may be run up to $1.25. What is the gentleman going to do when the taxi driver demands the $1.25? Is the gentleman going to argue with him? Is he going to engage in a street fight?

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman speaks beside the point at issue.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I think the gentleman can get additional time.

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Is the gentleman aware that the very point raised by the gentleman from Texas as to disputes arising out of taxicab fares with taxi drivers is one of the reasons the court said this new regulation should be enforced. Here is what the court said:

> The system increases cruising in congested areas, causes drivers to refuse unprofitable hauls and causes frauds and disputes.

Under the present system one company may recognize the present zoning system and another company may refuse to recognize it. A stranger here does not know where one zone begins or ends. One is half a mile wide and another may be 7 miles wide, and this produces disputes. I had the record here some time ago and I think the disturbances of the peace average something like seven cases a month, arising out of taxicab disputes because of the present chaotic conditions, which is the thing that the Utility Commission wants to correct.

Mr. BOYLAN. I thank the gentleman for his able contribution to a worthy cause.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. I would like first to confine myself to the statement of the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman is very painstaking and I do not think any man in this House works harder than he does to get at the facts; but, unfortunately, he has not got them right this time, and why? When he says that the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee was charged a certain amount under the meter rate I agree with him, but that is the old meter rate. That rate has not been changed because the Public Utilities Commission has not been permitted to use any money to regulate installed meters. I admit that is what we want to get away from, and how are we going to get away from it except by permitting the Public Utilities Commission to use whatever part of these funds they may need in order that the rates they promulgate may be effective, not only on one but on every taxicab in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. There are approximately 2,500 of these independents whom meters will ruin and put out of business. The peoples' counsel is a lawyer here named Richmond B. Keech, who is paid a big salary to represent the people of Washington and I wish you would look in the Washington Herald of this morning and notice his statement that meters will ruin the independents and that they do not want to change back to meters. These 2,500 independent taxies say they are making a living and they want this present system of a 20-cent zone continued. If they are satisfied, why does the gentleman want to interfere with the business? I quote this from this morning's Herald:

> Keech has the support of the Federation of Citizens Associations and other civic organizations in his fight against the meter order.

Mr. BOYLAN. I will say to the gentleman that he spoke a moment ago about the Diamond Cab Association being a big monopoly. Every one of the members of the Diamond Cab Association is an independent owner. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. BLANTON. No; there are just about one-third of them who are individual owners. There are men who own several Diamond cabs and employ other men to drive them.

Mr. BOYLAN. No; the gentleman is again in error.

Mr. BLANTON. I have checked that up, and know it to be a fact. And they are bound in an ironclad way by all the regulations of the company and if not controlled it could be one of the biggest monopolies in Washington.

Mr. BOYLAN. It is not a company, it is an association of independent drivers.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, an association is a company.

Mr. BOYLAN. No; they are independent drivers banded together for mutual protection.

Now, if the gentleman will look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14, page 4098, he will find this statement:

> Of the present 3,746 cabs, 2,556 of them, or 70 per cent, are owned by independent owners; while of the remaining 1,190 company-owned cabs, 706 belong to rental companies and only 484 belong to the seven different companies that might be classed as taxicab companies. Among the latter, the Black and White and Yellow Co. has only 200 cabs operating, and at its all-time peak had only 500 cabs, while of the remaining six taxicab companies not a single one now has, or has ever had, more than 50 cabs.

Mr. BLANTON. Who wrote that?

Mr. BOYLAN. I want to say that I am as receptive of information from all sources as is the gentleman from Texas. I do not ask him where he gets some of his statements. [Laughter.]

The Bell Cab Association—298 cabs—the Premier Cab Association—175 cabs, and other cooperative associations of independent owners, will certainly not be put out of business by enforcement of the meter order.

Now, gentlemen believe in a certain degree of safety, so if you get into a taxicab you want to arrive whole and not arrive at your point of destination in sections.

Mr. BLANTON. If you put meters in cabs and let them charge $1.25, you still have to protect your people from accidents. Meters do not protect them.

Mr. BOYLAN. Meters alone do not protect, but they cause safer driving and the commissioners can compel them to carry liability insurance.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not do it without law. The Public Utilities Commission holds that it is now without authority of law to require insurance.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph be closed in 27 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Now, if we are going into the question of liability insurance, we ought to have liability insurance here. All the large cities and towns of the country demand that liability insurance be carried by taxicabs. The gentleman from Texas knows there are judgments to the amount of half a million dollars unpaid in the city of Washington that have not been paid on account of irresponsible taxicab drivers.

Mr. COLLINS. The House has already passed a liability insurance act and sent it to the Senate, and the bill is pending there.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, the Lord only knows when that will become a law.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Where does the gentleman get his information that there is half a million dollars of judgments outstanding in the city of Washington?

Mr. BOYLAN. I received the information from several prominent attorneys in the city of Washington who are in a position to know.

Mr. HOLADAY. I have not been able to receive any such information, and I wonder if the gentleman's information is authentic.

Mr. BOYLAN. Perhaps I worked harder to get the information. The judgment record will show it.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that information is the most reliable of all the information the gentleman has.

Mr. BOYLAN. I thank the gentleman, and I am glad we agree on one thing. Just think of it, a half million dollars in judgments that can not be collected. You and I know that if you are unfortunate enough to meet with an accident immediately your expenses are doubled, trebled, or quadrupled, and yet if you want to avail yourself of a cheap taxicab ride you take your life in your hands for 20 cents. You get into a taxicab to-day at the Capitol to go to your dwelling place for 20 cents, and on the way you collide with another cab operated by a driver who has worked 14 hours and made only a dollar for himself. He has to get through as quickly as he can and get you to your destination in order to get a new fare. Therefore, he takes all kinds of chances. Assuming then that you were in a collision and you fractured a limb. What would that cost you? How far would the 20 cents go toward paying expenses attendant upon a fractured limb?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that a good meter costs $85.

Mr. BOYLAN. Oh, no; you can get a good meter, guaranteed for two years, for $35.

Mr. BLANTON. Only a cheap or second-hand meter could be bought for $35. The kind that I would ask them to use, a reliable one, would cost $85.

Mr. BOYLAN. I am not going to ask the men to pay $85 for a meter when these poor fellows can get a meter for $35. Why should I ask them to spend $85?

Mr. BLANTON. To get one reliable. But the $35 meter would not be reliable. I am fighting against all meters because they would run independents out of business. The $35 meter is no good.

Mr. BOYLAN. Oh, yes; it is guaranteed for two years.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman tell us how much accidents have increased since the fare has been reduced over what they were before that time?

Mr. BOYLAN. Oh, yes. They are killing at the rate of 10 a month.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. How many were they killing before that?

Mr. BOYLAN. About three.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman looked at the mile post of fatal accidents kept up daily in New York City to find the number they killed up there? They have such a mile post, corrected daily, where every day they report the number of people who have been killed in New York by traffic accidents.

Mr. BOYLAN. Of course, the appropriation for the District of Columbia has not yet included the empire city of New York.

Mr. BLANTON. The last time I looked at it, it was up in the many thousands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I have listened to the discussion of the amendment with some interest. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] argues that the mere fact that there is half a million dollars worth of judgments rendered against taxicab companies is one reason why we ought to meter them. I think the answer to that is that we ought to make them obtain insurance in order to take care of the public, and not meter them.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. In a moment. We have had some experience in Baltimore City. Two years ago the State legislature passed a law metering every taxicab in Baltimore City. The consequence was that the little fellows who had to pay $80 or $90 for a meter were put out of business and had to quit, and a lot of sharks came along, such as the Sun Taxi Co. and the General Taxi Co. and they ran around like wild cats. The little fellow who was trying to make a living had to go out of business as these monopolies were created, charging a quarter. There is nothing that prevents the Utilities Commission from raising the rates on the zones here. If 20 cents is not enough, permit them to charge 25 cents and make them obtain insurance, and if the bill comes in the next House before the Committee on the District of Columbia, I shall be in favor of compelling them to obtain insurance in order to take care of the public. In Baltimore there is but one taxicab that is worth while driving in, and that is the cab of the company that pay their men a regular salary, the Yellow cab. But you take your life in your hands, because they travel in the city at 40 and 45 miles an hour, in this kind of weather. I say, let the commission raise the rate and let it cut down the hours, or if it can not cut down the hours that these chauffeurs may work, let us pass a law compelling them to work no more than 8 or 10 hours a day, whatever is reasonable. I think you should vote down this amendment and let us get a proper regulation by way of insurance. I travel every evening from the House Office Building to the Union Station. When you get on one of the meter taxicabs it costs you 45 cents just to drive about half a mile.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman knows, as I explained, that those are the old meters and not the meters provided by the Utilities Commission under this provision.

Mr. PALMISANO. I say to the gentleman from New York that the meters did not take care of the public in Baltimore and will not take care of the public here. Make them obtain insurance, and cut down the hours that the chauffeurs are required to work. In Baltimore I may say that they run 2½ miles, and some companies 3½ miles, for 25 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLADAY. Is it my understanding the debate has been limited?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is whether the system is a fair method of determining the charge that should be levied or whether the existing zone system should be continued. The gentleman from Texas has cited the abuses that arise from no regulation under the existing zone system, of how taxicab drivers exact a tribute of 75 cents in going from the Union Station to the Willard Hotel, a mile and a half. That condition could not exist if we had the meter system.

Anyone who has the barest acquaintance with the meter system in effect in other cities knows that you pay according to the mileage. I say that a 25-cent rate, as established by the Utilities Commission, plus 5 cents for every one-third of a mile in excess of the first 2 miles, or 40 cents for 3 miles, is a reasonable charge.

In no other city in the country do the intolerable conditions exist which exist here. I venture this statement: That if it were left to the operators of the taxicabs in the District of Columbia to-day they would vote in favor of the meter system. It is not going to result in any curtailment of service. It will result in a little more added revenue. I do not believe it is fair, under the existing system, to have Government employees or any other persons in the District, four in number, get into a cab and be driven 7 miles and pay the taxicab driver only 20 cents. That is outrageously unremunerative. If any gentleman, rising in protest of the establishment of the meter system, can point out where the establishment of a rate of 25 cents for the first 2 miles and 5 cents for every third of a mile in excess is exorbitant and unfair, let him so rise.

There is no question here as to liability insurance. The supreme court has denied that the District Commissioners have the right to exact liability insurance. The only question is whether we shall come to the rescue of the people, particularly the drivers. I sympathize with those drivers in being required to work 12 or 14 hours a day for a stipend of a dollar. Let us give them a living wage, and not let it be said that in the House of Representatives you voted against allowing those men 25 cents for a 2-mile ride. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Who says these men only make a dollar a day?

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been stated time and time again. I have asked them how much they make under the existing system. The mere placing of a meter costing $35 or $50 will not place an undue burden on those drivers.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. I have ridden in those taxicabs many times, and I have made inquiry, and no man has told me that he has made less than $3 a day.

Mr. KELLER. Nor me either.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, what is $3 for a man working 16 hours a day? The question is whether the rate established by the Public Utilities Commission of 25 cents for 2 miles is a reasonable rate. I do not believe we should discriminate. I do not believe persons should get into those cabs and travel 7 miles and give the taxicab driver only 20 cents or 25 cents. I am not going to state what my practice is. I use the street cars whenever it is fair weather. When it is rainy weather I use the taxicabs. When I use the taxicab I do not give them a mere 25 cents. I believe that traveling 2 miles is worth at least 50 cents.

We have had the meter system in use in many cities. We have had low meter rates in Detroit; we have had low meter rates in Milwaukee; we have had low meter rates in other cities. The question is whether you are going to do justice to the drivers; whether you are going to establish a fair and remunerative rate; whether you are going to compel those who are abusing the zone rate, traveling 7 miles for 20 cents, to pay a fair stipend.

A meter speaks for itself. It is based upon distance. It is not based upon time. Who is here to say that 25 cents is an exorbitant charge for going 2 miles in the District of Columbia? I wish to get rid of these overcharges, these holdups cited by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I want a register, so that when I get in I will know the distance I have traveled and the amount the driver is entitled to receive. If I see fit to give him a little tip in addition, I want to know what the distance charge is. That is fair. Let us establish once and for all time a remunerative rate for distance carried, and not allow the cut rate, cutthroat system that is in effect at present, by which we are imposing upon these poor drivers the necessity of working 12 or 14 hours a day.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I again yield to the bellwether.

Mr. KELLER. How much does the gentleman pay for riding 2 miles on a street car?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the street car has been called into this debate by the gentleman from Texas, supported by the valuable ally, the gentleman from Cairo. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of street cars. The street car is a separate institution. They should be patronized. I believe in patronizing the streets cars and I believe in patronizing the railroads instead of busses. I patronize street cars because I believe it is my duty to see that that system should be supported. I am appealing to the membership of this body to establish a reasonable means of paying a remunerative rate to the drivers of taxicabs. I appeal to those in this body who use taxicabs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the time limit of 27 minutes was set with the understanding that certain gentlemen would be recognized to speak on this amendment.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has promised to recognize the gentleman from Arkansas for five minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope this amendment will be voted down.

When the matter of the consolidation of the two street-railway companies in Washington was before us a short time ago I had in mind that this thing was coming on. Whenever you start a concentration of these big interests you can never satisfy their greed. The purpose, as everybody knows, is to put the taxicabs out of business here so that the street-railway systems and the cabs will be one and the same thing. That is exactly what we are driving into. We are driving into a situation where they can exploit the public.

I say to you there is not a city in the United States that has better cab service than Washington City has right now. It is entirely satisfactory to the public. It is entirely satisfactory to those engaged in it.

I, too, have talked to drivers of taxicabs, but I have not yet talked to a driver who has ever told me he made less than $3.50 a day and who has not said he could live on that, and live nicely under present conditions.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when the consolidation of the railway companies was before the Committee on the District of Columbia the question then rose of permitting the railway companies to operate taxis, and the committee refused to allow it.

Mr. GLOVER. Absolutely. That is what they are seeking to do. The effect will be to turn the cabs over to the street-railway systems. Also it will put 1,500 ex-service men out of jobs and submit every man and woman who comes into Washington City and uses cabs to extortionate fees for driving a short distance. I have had the same experience these other gentlemen have had. The other night I drove from a downtown hotel to Congress to attend a night session. I got in a cab without thinking whether it was a 20-cent cab or not, with the result that I had to pay 70 cents, when I could have gotten here for 20 cents and had just as good service.

Men talk to you about having no protection under the present system. I want to say that I never saw more cautious drivers than we have in Washington City now. I never drive my car, although I have it here. I would not undertake to drive it in this city with the traffic there is here, without having a better knowledge of driving than I have. I feel absolutely safe when I get into one of these taxicabs, because the drivers know the rules of driving and observe them. Suppose the 435 Members of the House and the 96 Members of the Senate undertook to drive their cars in Washington City; the result would be more cripples than we now have.

Mr. BOYLAN. What about the $500,000 in unsatisfied judgments arising out of accidents due to inefficient and careless operation of cabs?

Mr. GLOVER. Oh, that is mere idle talk. Who knows about that? I heard the gentleman's statement a while ago, made in somewhat uncertain terms, that it might be this or it might be that. The inference is justified that the gentleman did not have any accurate information upon it at all.

Mr. BOYLAN. There was nothing uncertain about the $500,000. That is a matter of record.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, these are perilous times. It seems to me every Member should take into consideration the exact conditions existing with respect to labor.

Anyone who has resided in Washington several years knows that a few years ago we were confronted with a kind of monopoly here on the part of two companies that brought about a situation not fair from any standpoint. We likewise know that when the zone system was put into effect these companies brought large numbers of cars here from other cities for the purpose of crushing those who were forced to go out and do the best they could to make a living.

My sympathy has always been with the little fellow. I know, and you know, that if you require these individuals to pay a high price for a meter many of those who are now barely able to make a livelihood can not afford to go to this extra expense. As far as I have been able to learn, there is no dissatisfaction at present with the taxicab service. If this be true and we compel cabs to be equipped with meters we will be taking the means of making a living from those who were forced by economic conditions out of good jobs to take up taxi driving to make a livelihood for themselves and their families.

Why should we attempt to put into effect a measure which would enrich some big company to the extent that it would force out of business these fellows who are not able to get meters to-day?

I venture the assertion that if the Members have taken an inventory, or have asked those who drive taxicabs what was their former occupation, it has been found that many of those at present driving cabs have held lucrative positions, but because of inability to get any other kind of work have gone into the taxicab business and are able to make $3, $4, or $5 a day, thus keeping the wolf away from the door.

So, these conditions it seems to me make it necessary that we do nothing that would in any way bring an injury to those who are now making an honest livelihood in this occupation. They should not be penalized. Therefore, in my opinion, this amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, for a great many years in Washington a very unsatisfactory condition existed with reference to the monopoly held by two taxicab companies at the Union Station and at the hotels. The then commissioners refused to take any action. New commissioners were appointed and some changes were made.

Then came the investigation and the decision of the Public Utilities Commission, and an order was entered for meters.

Mr. Chairman, bear in mind that the issue in this case is simply between the two taxicab companies that formerly had a monopoly, and want it again, and the street-car companies on one side, and the independent drivers of taxicabs and the public on the other side.

This order was issued by General Patrick, and General Patrick when appearing before our committee—I am reading from page 100 of the hearings—with reference as to whether or not the residents of Washington were satisfied with the present condition, said:

> I should say the consumers are highly satisfied.

This is the testimony of General Patrick himself.

If this provision is taken out it means that the independent operators, including the Diamond Taxicab, which is a cooperative organization with about 1,200 members, will be practically put out of business. As far as I have been able to ascertain by inquiring of various drivers for the past 15 months, they make on the average about $3 or $3.50 per day, occasionally more and occasionally less. You may say they are not making enough. If this amendment prevails it means you have thrown them out of business and they do not make a dollar.

The reasonable thing to do is to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland that this limitation be continued in the bill until the District of Columbia Committee shall have had time to thoroughly investigate the matter and report appropriate legislation.

It is simply a question of whether or not you are going to throw out of employment these 1,200 members of a cooperative concern functioning as the Diamond Taxicab, as well as a great many other independents, and turn the thing back to where the big companies can again secure the monopoly which they had at one time.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. BOLAND. Does the gentleman wish to state to the House that in his opinion $3.50 a day is a fair day's pay for these taxicab drivers?

Mr. HOLADAY. I say it is better than no pay at all, and that is the question involved here. It is not a question of whether $3 or $3.50 is fair, but whether or not you want to throw these men out of employment and take their $3 a day and give it as profit to the owners of a monopoly. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 10, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF VEHICLES AND TRAFFIC

For personal services, $68,320.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 9, line 5, strike out "$68,320" and insert in lieu thereof "$74,280."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to explain the purpose of this amendment.

If this amendment prevails it will add to the sum granted by the committee and the amount will then be in accordance with the recommendation of the Budget.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this is one of the services that is not only self-sustaining, but brings to the District a large amount of money. It has to do with the permits that are granted for automobiles and vehicles as well as registration of titles. The registration of titles was added in 1923 and this has brought into the treasury of the District the sum of $166,750, and all of these items each year bring into the treasury $658,000.

This department has dispensed, voluntarily, with the temporary services that they employed from time to time, which amounted to $5,000.

I am not in favor of increasing appropriations except when the increase of an appropriation will bring some return. We might as well say that we should decrease the appropriation for our Customs Service, which is one of the means of raising revenue for the United States. We might as well say that we will reduce or cripple the service of the Internal Revenue Bureau, which is one of the great agencies bringing money into the Treasury of the United States.

I am informed by those who have charge of the Traffic Department that by reason of the additional service that is required on account of their title work, it will be absolutely impossible for them to efficiently do the work that is required of them or that they should do, and at the same time get the amount of revenue that should be paid into the Treasury from these different sources. I therefore hope because of the fact this is a money raiser, the committee will agree to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a great many go on the theory that if we make money we ought to spend it simply because we have it, and the more we make the more we ought to spend. The committee takes the position that the criterion of expenditure should be not the amount of income but the amount required to maintain adequate, efficient, and economical service. The amendment here even proposes to increase the sum over the Budget estimate. It goes to show how utterly inconsiderate these bureau chiefs are when they come to Congress asking for money. Apparently there is no limit to which they will not go in increasing the cost of government. Back in the year 1928, only a little while ago, we were only appropriating $25,000 for this purpose. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the committee was generous in their allowance for this item, and not a dollar should be added to the amount provided by the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman says that a while ago the appropriation was $25,000.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; in 1928.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And the receipts at that time were $73,302, while in 1933 it amounted to $348,000.

Mr. CANNON. That is true, but we are making the appropriation on the basis of service. One reason why we made this reduction was that they had four places down there that they wanted money appropriated for that were not filled and have not been filled for months.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to modify my amendment. I intended to make it on the recommendation of the Budget, but through a mistake it is over the recommendation of the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 5, strike out "$68,329" and insert "$73,780."

Mr. CANNON. Even that amendment appropriates for four more men than they need.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman how he arrived at the sum of $68,320, the appropriation in the bill? What was the basis of it?

Mr. CANNON. We took off the furloughs, which, of course, should be taken off in all these appropriations, and we took out the positions that had not been filled. They have been vacant since July.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] has been attempting to do a rather seriously good job. I think perhaps like myself he is accustomed to being in the minority, and certainly we both consider ourselves right.

In connection with that I want to call your attention to some words of Andrew Jackson 100 years ago in his message to Congress that bears on this question of appropriations for the District of Columbia. It is so pertinent and up-to-date that I am imposing it on your attention.

Andrew Jackson in December, 1831, in his annual message to Congress said:

I deem it my duty again to call your attention to the condition of the District of Columbia. It was doubtless wise in the framers of our Constitution to place the people of this District under the jurisdiction of the general Government (was Old Hickory's tongue in his cheek as he wrote it?) but to accomplish the objects they had in view it is not necessary that this people should be deprived of all of the privileges of self-government. Independent of the difficulty of inducing the representatives of distant States to turn their attention to projects of laws which are not of the highest interest to their constituents, they are not individually, nor is Congress collectively, well qualified to legislate over the local concerns of this District. Consequently, its interests are much neglected, and the people are almost afraid to present their grievances lest a body in which they are not represented and which feels little sympathy in their local relations should, in its attempt to make laws for them, do more harm than good. * * * Is it not just to allow them at least a delegate in Congress, if not a local legislature, to make laws for the District, subject to the approval or rejection of Congress? I earnestly recommend the extension to them of every political right which their interests require and which may be compatible with the Constitution.

I read that to the committee at the present time because it is directly in line with a few suggestions that have been made that would serve to take the immense detail of these local concerns off the shoulders of the Congress, and place it in some measure on the shoulders of the people of the District of Columbia, where there is really an immense amount of latent ability, that might very well be called into service. I know that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in many ways agrees with exactly what I have said.

Mr. BLANTON. I do in some things, but if we were to have a legislature here in the District, about the first thing it would do would be to pass a law that the Government should not have any rights here at all in its own District.

Mr. COYLE. I agree with my friend from Texas in that I do not believe the people of the District of Columbia should have a legislature, and neither do I believe that they should have unlimited franchise. I know the history of that, and the way it developed, but I do believe, in line with President Jackson's suggestion, that when the time comes that the people of the District of Columbia, like the people of Puerto Rico or the people of Alaska or any one of the Territories or island possessions, shall have a Delegate to present the views of the people of the District of Columbia here in Congress, then we will begin to get somewhere. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase, installation, and modification of electric traffic lights, signals and controls, markers, painting white lines, labor, maintenance of non-passenger-carrying motor vehicles, and such other expenses as may be necessary in the judgment of the commissioners, $63,200: Provided, That no part of this or any other appropriation contained in this act, or that is now available shall be expended for building, installing, and maintaining street-car loading platforms and lights of any description employed to distinguish same.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 9, line 11, strike out the comma at the end of the line and the words "or that is now available."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is merely to correct a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is this the usual provision carried in the bill, with reference to street-car loading platforms?

Mr. CANNON. It was carried in a former bill and was inadvertently included here.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Does that mean that in the future we will have less loading platforms and other necessary facilities for people who are waiting for street cars?

Mr. CANNON. No. This in no way affects present accommodations.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. It does not, then, mean a lessening of the number of loading platforms and other protection for the pedestrian who uses the street cars?

Mr. CANNON. No. The street-car companies maintain them and will continue to provide all needed facilities of the kind.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. And the money for this purpose is derived from another source?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. These platforms are merely a part of the equipment of the transportation companies, and they take care of all expenses incident to their construction and maintenance.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I do not want anything done to lessen the protection now afforded those of us who use street cars, and am glad that loading platforms and other similar facilities are to be maintained in the future.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTER OF WILLS

For personal services, $60,000.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLADAY: Page 10, line 16, strike out "$60,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$68,490."

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment adds $8,490 to the bill and brings the amount available for the register of wills back to the Budget figures. The register of wills is a fee office and, strange as it may seem, the business of that office has been increasing. It was more last year than it had ever been before, and it will be more this year. That is brought about by the fact that many estates in process of being administered are insolvent. Therefore there is greater demand upon the office of the register of wills. In 1932 the register of wills collected $93,000, which was about $3,000 more than the year before, and there has been a steady increase of something like two or three thousand dollars a year. I apprehend that this figure was cut without a full realization of the condition. If this amendment is not adopted, it means that some five or six employees of the office will be dropped. The business of the office has been increasing, so that with his present force he has not been able to keep the work current, and at the present time the work is behind and is gradually falling behind. In about all of the other offices the work is current. I believe it is a mistake to allow this office where the work is increasing to be decreased in personnel through a decrease in the appropriation and thus throw out of employment five or six people and get the office into worse and worse shape as the weeks go by. The $8,490 brings it to where it was last year. There has been an increase of only one employee in this office since 1927, and I believe that in the interest of wise administration the amendment should prevail.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Yesterday I put in the RECORD a list of all of the Government employees in the District of Columbia who were drawing over $2,500 a year, showing the increases they obtained under the classification act of 1923. Among them happened to be the register of wills, Mr. Theodore L. Cogswell. It showed that his salary under the 1923 classification act was raised from $4,000 to $6,400. Then I put in a table of the auditor showing that Mr. Cogswell was one of those who, in addition to his $6,400, had been retired under the emergency officers' retirement act at $125 per month retired pay.

Then I mentioned that last year Mr. Cogswell got $700 from the Howard University as professor of wills, for delivering lectures there. He claimed it required three or four hours a day to prepare those lectures. In no way did I attack him. When I referred to him I started out by saying, "Here is Theodore Cogswell, a splendid, good fellow," but I mentioned those facts. Were not they pertinent facts? Was not it well for Members here to know about them? My friend from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] later took the floor just before we adjourned, and he intimated that I had done Mr. Cogswell an injustice when such was not the fact, and he used this language in referring to Mr. Cogswell:

He is entitled to the pay of an emergency officer, and I fear my colleague gave the impression that he was drawing such pay. I want to make it clear to my colleague that he is not drawing such pay as an emergency officer, but only his pay as register of wills.

Now, the facts are that as soon as that disabled emergency officers' retirement act was passed Mr. Cogswell applied for retirement and for retirement pay. He was retired at $125 per month for life additional to the salary of $6,400 per year he was drawing from the District government as register of wills. He claimed to be disabled 45 per cent. He was retired upon the basis of 38 per cent permanent disability. Immediately there was a check handed him for $180.93, up to that date. Under that retirement act he has drawn from the United States Government, and I got these authentic figures from the department this morning, $6,399.67 in cash as a disabled emergency retired officer, and that is additional to his salary of $6,400 per year as register of wills. If he is 38 per cent disabled permanently, how can he earn $6,400 per year and also $700 for lecturing?

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. This is just why we can not stop abuses. Whenever we try to put important facts before Congress, somebody tries to hamstring us. We are not inveighing against the acknowledged integrity of individuals. We are merely discussing facts. I was inveighing against the 1923 classification act as unduly raising salaries and arguing for its repeal, and then somebody not posted gets up and tries to destroy every effort made to remedy conditions. This is the reason the Congress will never change conditions and will never properly reduce governmental expenses. You will always find somebody who is a friend of the fellow, or of the bureau, or of the department who will get up here and defend, when he does not know the facts and is not well posted.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield now.

Mr. HOLADAY. I wish the gentleman would bear in mind that my amendment does not affect the gentleman about whom the gentleman from Texas is talking at all. This goes to five or six employees in the office. I fully agree with what the gentleman says about the Personnel Board, and all the gentleman may say about the register of wills may be true, but this does not affect him at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, if my friend from Illinois will wait just a minute, I will give the gentleman some information that will appeal to him after I am through with my present subject. The Washington Herald this morning, in speaking of that incident, said:

Cogswell called upon BLANTON in the latter's office and sought his assistance in having this amount restored. BLANTON is said to have promised to help restore the appropriation, but instead he arose yesterday and accused Cogswell of conducting a lobby.

Now, who knew about his calling on me except myself, my secretary, and Mr. Cogswell? Nobody. So that newspaper item must have come from Cogswell, because my secretary does not give interviews. I made no such promise to Mr. Cogswell, and Mr. Cogswell will not say that I made such a promise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I told Mr. Cogswell about some idleness and "pink teas" going on in his office, and told him that if he would require more diligence of his employees he could dispense with some of them. And I told him that I would recheck his office and see whether we had cut him too deep. I made no other promise to him. I did recheck his office.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I took occasion to make some comment about Mr. Cogswell, and I found that Mr. Cogswell has not drawn a cent from the emergency officers' retirement fund.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, if the gentleman will just wait a minute until I get through, I will give him all the facts. The gentleman is mistaken. I have the facts here before me authenticated by the records of the department. Mr. Theodore Cogswell has drawn in cash $6,399.67 from that retirement fund, that he has kept, as a disabled emergency officer, 38 per cent permanently disabled. Now, if the gentleman will just wait a minute, he will have all the facts.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Up to what time?

Mr. BLANTON. Up to last October. You remember that I got the Committee on Military Affairs to hold hearings on my House Joint Resolution No. 355, when we kicked William Wolff Smith out, and that last year we passed an act that provided that any employee who was receiving a salary from this Government of as much as $3,000 could not draw this disabled emergency officers' retirement pay. Why? Because in drawing the retirement pay he is supposed to be disabled; and if he is disabled, he can not earn a salary of $6,400 per year as register of wills, and also earn $700 additional as professor of wills lecturing in Howard University.

Therefore we made that provision in the law, and automatically those who drew salaries of as much as $3,000 from the Government were not permitted to draw further payment from the retirement fund. But the bureau, after stopping his pay, after the passage of that act, looked up his record and found that he was wounded in France. There was a proviso in that bill which provided that those wounded in actual battle would be allowed to draw their retirement pay regardless of any salary they draw. So, after having stopped his pay, the bureau restored it, and when they sent him his check in October, 1932, he sent it back; and I want to commend him for it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And he has sent it back ever since.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but just wait a minute until I tell you what happened. I know more about it than my friend does. He sent his October check back, and this is exactly what he said, as I quote—

I hope to be able to continue this action—

That is, of sending the checks back—at least until conditions are improved.

Indicating that when things get better he is going to draw his retirement pay again.

Now, I commend him for what he has done; but my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], evidently did not know he had drawn $6,399.67 from this disabled emergency officers' retirement fund when the gentleman made his speech yesterday.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, yes; I did.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman's speech was not quite fair either to me or to the House.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But I know he discontinued it.

Mr. BLANTON. Now I want to use the rest of my time.

Over in Virginia, splendid old Commonwealth, my father was a Virginian, the clerk of the court there probates all wills. The clerk of the court grants letters testamentary. The clerk of the court grants guardianship letters. You can probate a will there in four days' time and it costs the people interested in that matter less than $5 to do it. Here in Washington it takes about 12 months or more to probate a will. It costs a minimum of about $35 to probate a will in the District of Columbia. Old, archaic procedure. Instead of letting the clerk attend to it, instead of letting Mr. Cogswell attend to it, there is a $10,000-a-year judge here who has to sign every order. These $10,000-a-year judges in Washington designate one of their number to sign probate orders. You could change the system in that office and put some of the proper, common-sense rules in it that they have in Virginia and save two-thirds of the expense of that office and have a better system here. Chairman CANNON and his committee have been very fair to Mr. Cogswell and this amendment should not be passed.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to permit me to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal of respect for the vigilance and earnestness of my friend the gentleman from Texas. He takes a great deal of trouble to make researches as to the operations of the various offices of the Government, and I commend him for it; but I do not believe he will think it is fair, nor will we think it is fair, to penalize an existing establishment, or the occupants of an office the creation of which, the support of which, depends upon ourselves, the Members of Congress. It may be that it is more expensive to probate a will in the District of Columbia than it is elsewhere. I know it is not more expensive here than it is in New York. I had one experience in the District in the probate of a will, and it was done very promptly, expeditiously, and efficiently.

If there is to be any change in probate procedure in Washington, it is a matter for the legislative committee of the House and is not for a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations to undertake at the behest of one economy enthusiast to cut the appropriation for the office by one-third or one-half without deliberation, without thought. Changing probate procedure is a legislative matter. So long as the procedure remains as it is, so long as we have the office there with this staff of 36 employees, I think it is wrong and unjust to deprive this office of the appropriation to which it is entitled. It should be remembered that last year this office brought in a revenue of $93,000. Surely Congress does not want to have this self-supporting office help make up the deficits in other departments? Last year it made a profit of $25,000. The appropriation allowed by the Budget is $68,640. I believe the sole purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is to restore the Budget allowance.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. We are giving this office in this bill $68,000. Does the gentleman know that is twice as much as the same office in Richmond, Va., gets? Richmond, Va., would compare favorably with Washington, D. C., in the matter of population, and so forth, would it not?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; this bill gives them $60,000, not $68,000; and the population of Richmond is only 183,000 against 487,000 in Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about the $8,000; I am talking about the total, $68,000, when the same office in Richmond, Va., gets only half that much.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think what they do in Richmond is hardly relevant to the matter now under consideration.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. HOLADAY. Let me suggest that the clerk has nothing to do with the law governing the probate of wills. It may be, as the gentleman from Texas says, that the Virginia law is much better than the District of Columbia law. In Virginia the clerk may administer the law, but that has no bearing upon the question now before us. It is simply a question whether we want to curtail the activities of this office by dismissing six employees and causing the office to become further and further behind in its work.

Mr. GRIFFIN. In other words, demoralizing the office. This is an office that brings in $93,000 a year. Are we to begrudge them the amount the Budget allowed, $68,000? Should we not respect the recommendation of the Budget and not penalize a number of innocent employees in the office and compel their discharge and probably interfere with the administration of the office?

I think we ought to appropriate the $68,000 the Budget recommended, and even then we would not be doing too much, because the office shows a profit of $25,000 a year, even if we allow them the $68,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the committee is very anxious to provide every facility for the operation of these offices. We have been told that by the use of ordinary business efficiency this office could save and ought to save a great deal more than $8,000. We felt we were very generous in providing this amount for its maintenance.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. How many employees are there in this office?

Mr. CANNON. There are 35 employees there.

Mr. BLANTON. There are 34 besides Mr. Cogswell.

Mr. COLLINS. They must write the same records over and over, day after day.

Mr. CANNON. There must be some circumlocution of some sort. In the Virginia State office which handles this work for the entire State they require only five employees to perform the duties for which this office employs 35.

Mr. COLLINS. They have five at Richmond.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; at Richmond, Va.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLADAY. I understood the gentleman to say that the evidence before the committee indicated they could get along——

Mr. CANNON. No; the gentleman apparently misunderstood me. I said that we were told that the office could be efficiently managed for much less.

Mr. HOLADAY. The evidence before the committee was that it was difficult for them to get along with the present appropriation; that even if you increased it they could not keep the work current.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has had sufficient experience with testimony adduced at these hearings to know that on every application for an appropriation from the public funds they always submit ample and convincing evidence. In one item before this committee last year they asked for over $300,000 when it later appeared that less than $100,000 was required.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand a division.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this matter is of such importance I think we ought to have a quorum present. I make the point there is not a quorum present.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PRALL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 14643, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE PRESIDENT CALVIN COOLIDGE

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 42).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be compiled, printed with illustrations, and bound, as may be directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, 25,000 copies of the oration delivered by Hon. Arthur P. Rugg in the House of Representatives during the exercises held in memory of the late President Calvin Coolidge on February 6, 1933, including all the proceedings and the program of exercises, of which 8,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 17,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 4, strike out "25" and insert in lieu thereof "15"; in line 9, strike out "8" and insert "5"; in line 10, strike out "17" and insert "10."

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Will these documents be distributed through the folding room or the document room?

Mr. STEVENSON. Through the folding room, as I understand it.

Mr. MICHENER. Then each Member will get his quota?

Mr. STEVENSON. Each Member will get his own quota.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PANAMA CANAL

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I offer a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 49) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 49

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 7522) entitled "An act to provide a new Civil Code for the Canal Zone and to repeal the existing Civil Code," to omit Senate amendments numbered 15 to 23 inclusive.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the adoption of this resolution will not require the reprinting of all of this document?

Mr. LEA. It will not. That is the object of proceeding in this way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WYANT (at the request of Mr. DARROW), for balance of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. MONTAGUE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 6456. An act to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 16, 1933, at 12 o'clock noon.

10445. By Mr. HAINES: Petition signed by Rev. H. R. Wilkes and other members of the York County (Pa.) Ministerial Association, urging the United States House of Representatives to vote for the stop-alien representation amendment to the United States Constitution; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

10446. By Mr. JAMES: Telegram from Ironwood Association of Commerce, Ironwood, Mich., asking for economies to balance the Budget; to the Committee on Appropriations.

10447. By Mr. LARRABEE: Petition of Mrs. H. O. Pritchard and 111 other persons, representing missionary societies of various Protestant churches in Indianapolis, Ind., petitioning Congress to defeat the Howard resolution relating to Indian affairs in the Department of the Interior; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

10448. Also, petition of Rev. Edwin E. Hale and 80 other citizens of Indianapolis, Ind., petitioning Congress to defeat all measures proposing modification of the Volstead Act or repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and urging all necessary appropriations for maintenance and enforcement of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10449. By Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts: Petition of John F. Leahy and seven other residents of East Taunton, Mass., urging a revaluation of the gold ounce and the correction of financial abuses associated with mass production; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

10450. By Mr. MEAD: Petition of citizens of Erie County, Buffalo, N. Y., urging enactment of the stop-alien representation amendment to the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

10451. By Mr. NELSON of Maine: Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Maine, memorializing Congress to enact into law the Hill bill, H. R. 13999; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10452. By Mr. SNOW: Memorial of the legislature of the State of Maine, memorializing Congress to promptly enact into law House bill 13999; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10453. By Mr. SUMMERS of Washington: Petition signed by Bertha Speck and 42 other citizens of Yakima, Wash., urging adoption of the stop-alien representation amendment to the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

10454. By Mr. STALKER: Petition of Christine Stickney, secretary of Circle No. 4 of the Church of Christ, Elmira, N. Y., and 25 other members, opposing the return of beer and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10455. Also, petition of Mrs. R. R. Birch, secretary of the Ladies' Aid Society, and 500 members; Mrs. C. C. Squier, secretary of the Women's Home Missionary Society, and 190 members; and Annie D. Payne, secretary of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society, all of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Ithaca, N. Y., opposing the return of beer and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10456. Also, petition of Oswald Baker and 25 other residents of Ithaca, N. Y., R. F. D. No. 2, opposing every legislative act that would legalize alcoholic liquors stronger than one-half of 1 per cent; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10457. Also, petition of Florence M. Wheat, secretary of Taylor Philathea Class, and 57 members of class of the Disciple Church, Elmira, N. Y., opposing the return of beer and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10458. By Mr. WASON: Petition of citizens of Groveton, N. H., favoring the stop-alien representation amendment to the United States Constitution; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

10459. By Mr. WEST: Resolution of the Woman's Home Missionary Society, Mount Vernon, Ohio, urging legislation which will establish a Federal motion-picture commission, declare the motion-picture industry a public utility, regulate the trade practices of the industry used in the distribution of pictures, supervise the selection and treatment of subject material during the processes of production, and provide that all pictures entering interstate and foreign commerce be produced and distributed under Government supervision and regulation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

10460. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the Sons of Philippines, Salinas, Calif., expressing their viewpoint on the Dickstein bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

10461. Also, petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, opposing the enactment of any blue law for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1933

(Legislative day of Friday, February 10, 1933)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. HATFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My colleague [Mr. WHEELER] is absent owing to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained on official business of the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is detained on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. COPELAND] is necessarily absent from the Senate because of the death of his father. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SCHALL] is unavoidably absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

WITHDRAWAL OF CLOTURE PETITION

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, on behalf of those who signed the cloture petition regarding the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to take up the proposed amendment to the Constitution, in view of the fact that the vote was had on yesterday, I ask to withdraw the petition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION—REPEAL OF PROHIBITION

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], striking out section 3 of the committee amendment, was agreed to last night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire formally to offer Senate Joint Resolution 202 as a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 211.

The substitute is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Article XVIII of the amendments to this Constitution is hereby repealed. The sale of intoxicating liquors within the United States or any territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for consumption at the place of sale (commonly known as a saloon), and the transportation of intoxicating liquors into any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States in which the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors are prohibited by law, are hereby prohibited. The Congress and the several States, Territories, and possessions shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

ATTACK ON LIFE OF PRESIDENT-ELECT ROOSEVELT

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I, like all the world, am much shocked at the dastardly attack upon the President elect yesterday. That any such thing could have happened with all the safeguards that are thrown around the President elect is beyond my comprehension, and it seems quite impossible to guard against such unexpected attacks. I express my deepest sympathy for the wounded and my congratulations to the President elect that he escaped. I would like to read into the RECORD a telegram which I have just received from one of the principal newspaper publishers of Paterson, N. J.:

PATERSON, N. J., February 16, 1933.

HAMILTON F. KEAN,
United States Senate:

Wire stories carry report that despicable Miami assassin was member of anarchist ring in Paterson. Federal and local investigations here thus far offer nothing even nearly definite to indicate this is so. Zangara's association here brief and intangible. In name of decency and fairness, and out of respect to the city of Paterson, which has given State and Nation some of its great men, I urge you to protest most vigorously against unfair maligning of our reputation. As representative of New Jersey I respectfully exhort you to use your every influence to prevent serious injury to the fair name of a community so law-abiding, so patriotic, and so sincerely devoted to everything worth while and decent. Speak out with emphasis and courage to repel this blasphemy, in the name of 140,000 decent souls.

HARRY B. HAINES,
Publisher Paterson Evening News.

Mr. President, Paterson gave to the United States a distinguished Vice President in the person of Garret A. Hobart and a distinguished Attorney General in the person of John W. Griggs, besides it being a leader in all patriotic work for many years.

ATTACK ON THE PRESIDENT ELECT—IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I read from a morning paper, the Washington Herald, dated February 16, 1933, the headline:

Roosevelt escapes assassin at Miami. Cermak and four others shot.

The subheadlines of the paper state:

Anarchist is seized; confesses firing at the next President. Woman throws up arms of gunman in act of firing. Cermak, Chicago mayor, undergoes operation. President remains on yacht. Guards increased.

Mr. President, the frequent attacks that are made upon our Government are becoming almost continuous. The majority of cases where the assassination of a President has been attempted or carried out have been the acts of individuals who come from some other country with the idea of destroying the head of our Government and then bringing about its overthrow. This was the case in the assassination of President McKinley; also the attempted assassination of ex-President Roosevelt in the campaign of 1912 by John Schrank.

The attempt last night is by another foreigner, who has admitted he was in a plot to assassinate the King of Italy in 1911. The assassin is alleged to have stated after his arrest that he would kill all Presidents and all public officials and police officers.

Mr. President, there has been upon the calendar since the beginning of the first session of this Congress House bill 12044, sponsored by Congressman DIES and supported by the patriotic organizations of this Nation. Upon every call of the calendar there have been some objections made to its consideration in this body. The Labor Department, through its Secretary and those who have the responsibility of enforcing the immigration laws, have repeatedly said to the Committee on Immigration, of which I am chairman, that there is nothing the Congress of the United States can do that will more substantially supplement their efforts in dealing with the undesirables who come to our land, either by way of legal or illegal admissions, than the passage of this bill. The only change it makes in our present deportation laws is that it adds to section 1 of the act of October 16, 1918, the words, "aliens who are anarchists or communists."

Then the bill defines a communist as any alien who is a member of an organization that believes in the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or the assassination of its public officials.

The passage of this measure, in my judgment, due to the times in which we live, and because of this overt act upon the part of this man who has attempted the life of our President elect, is so important and so timely that I feel, as an expression of resentment by this body, that we could do nothing better than to lay aside the unfinished business now before us and take up for immediate consideration House bill 12044 and pass it, and by so doing serve notice upon these man-killers who come to our land that we will not tolerate such action if within our power to prevent, and that it is our determined effort to rid this country of those who encourage sedition, those who instigate or participate in plots against the lives of our public men. The foreign element which advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government must be excluded.

Those in our own land who have acquired this abhorrent character of inspiration have derived it from those whose nativity and whose citizenship largely belong in some other country. We can deal with those, Mr. President, who have developed this inspiration under our own flag, who are an integral part of our citizenship; but we find it difficult for the enforcing department of our Government to deal with the alien who continuously preaches, after his admittance, against our institutions and advocates the doctrine of change by force.

The adoption of the measure to which I have referred will give the Labor Department an instrument with which to deal with this class of undesirable immigrants.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business before this body may be temporarily laid aside and that House bill 12044 be taken up for immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are working now under a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 3 o'clock, and the time between now and 3 o'clock will not make any material difference in the situation so far as it could be remedied by the bill proposed by the able Senator from West Virginia. That bill will call for discussion, for it injects into our immigration laws a new principle, and one which I should not be willing to support without further debate. I shall have to object to the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought the Senator from West Virginia had yielded the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. I had not, but I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President; I thought the Senator had surrendered the floor.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have not surrendered the floor.

Mr. President, I do not in any way want to interfere with the consideration of the unfinished business that is now before this body. I have great respect for the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I am quite willing to defer the consideration of House bill 12044 until 3 o'clock, at which time we will have concluded consideration of the unfinished business that is now before the Senate. So I amend my request and now ask unanimous consent that we take up and consider the House bill referred to at the conclusion of the unfinished business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not press that request now. I would not consent that the measure to which he has referred have precedence over a resolution which went over yesterday and which I expect to call up immediately after the vote on the prohibition matter. It may not take long to dispose of the resolution, but I will have to object at this moment to the request of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HATFIELD. Very well. I wish to give notice, Mr. President, here and now, that I will renew my request for unanimous consent at the conclusion of the consideration of the unfinished business; and if I can not obtain unanimous consent, I will then move to take up for consideration House bill 12044.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the indignation, the resentment, and the sorrow expressed by the Senator from West Virginia respecting the incident which occurred at Miami, Fla., yesterday prompts response from every loyal American citizen. It occasions resentment to realize that such a cowardly and inhuman attack could be made upon the President elect and it provokes resentment in the breasts of all of us. We grieve, too, that others who were not the direct objects of the attack should have suffered serious injury.

There is one thing that must be understood that even in times of distress and disturbance, when forces which normally could not prove powerful may be augmented by anxiety and discontent and manifest themselves in such incidents as that to which reference is being made, still the people of this country are loyal to their Government. They are loyal to those intrusted with authority and would hedge them about with protection and security. Let it be understood that when the authority of the Government is about to be transferred all of us who are Americans, who love our flag and support its institutions, stand side by side, united in the purpose to preserve those institutions and to give protection to those who are charged with public responsibility.

We may complain, we may make mistakes, but, thank God, we have the best Government on this earth, and our flag is still the most beautiful that ever was uplifted into light. Pitiable it is beyond the power of language to portray that one who has the affectionate regard of all the right-minded, loyal citizens of America should be endangered by the effort and attack of an assassin.

GIUSEPPE ZANGARA, ASSASSIN, NOT ASSOCIATED IN PATERSON, N. J.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD the telegram which I have just received from Mr. Harry B. Haines, publisher of the Paterson Evening News, of Paterson, N. J. He denies that the would-be assassin of President-elect Roosevelt is a resident of Paterson, as was reported in the press to-day.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

PATERSON, N. J., February 16, 1933.

W. WARREN BARBOUR,
United States Senator:

Wire stories carry report that despicable Miami assassin was member of anarchist ring in Paterson. Federal and local investigations here thus far offer nothing even nearly definite to indicate this is so. Zangara's association here brief and intangible. In name of decency and fairness, and out of respect to the city of Paterson, which has given State and Nation some of its great men, I urge you to protest most vigorously against unfair maligning of our reputation. As representative of New Jersey, I respectfully exhort you to use your every influence to prevent serious injury to the fair name of a community so law-abiding, so patriotic, and so sincerely devoted to everything worth while and decent. Speak out with emphasis and courage to repel this blasphemy in the name of 140,000 decent souls.

HARRY B. HAINES,
Publisher Paterson Evening News.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 42) to compile, print, and bind the proceedings of Congress in connection with the exercises in memory of the late President Calvin Coolidge, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 49), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 7522) to provide a new Civil Code for the Canal Zone and to repeal the existing Civil Code, to omit Senate amendments Nos. 15 to 23, inclusive.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 4368. An act for the relief of the widow of George W. McDonald;

H. R. 6456. An act to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended;

H.R. 7518. An act to amend an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of Canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone, and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and

H. R. 13710. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President in a primary election

Whereas the present convention system of nominating candidates for President and Vice President is undemocratic and has often resulted in manipulation by bosses and the selection of candidates not favored by the majority of the party members; and

Whereas the best method to enable the voters to control nominations is through a primary election: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation providing for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President through a nation-wide presidential primary election; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOS. J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CORNELIUS YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress for higher tariff on dairy products

Whereas the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics has listed the following figures for imports of dairy products into the United States for the year ending June 30, 1932:

Total value of all dairy imports into the United States, $14,293,000.

| Amounts of dairy imports into the United States: | Pounds |
|---|---|
| Butter | 1,838,000 |
| Casein or lactarine | 1,904,000 |
| Swiss cheese | 13,568,000 |
| Other cheese | 43,667,000 |
| Condensed and evaporated milk and cream | 1,470,000 |
| Dried malted milk | 818,000 |
| Cream | 118,000 |
| Milk | 280,000 |

Whereas thousands of farmers in various sections of the United States depend mostly on dairying for a living; and

Whereas it is evident from the above figures that farmers in other countries come into the United States and take away the market of the American farmer, thereby forcing the farmers in the United States to consume that which they produce themselves, or to seek a market outside of the United States; and

Whereas the present tariff on dairy products is no longer as effective as it was before many European countries abandoned the gold standard, with a consequent premium on American money in practically all European nations; and

Whereas importers claim that the European farmer can lay down his butter on the New York market and receive only 3 cents a pound for it, and still receive a larger return than he would obtain by the sale of this butter at home; and

Whereas this butter made in Europe, and paid for at the rate of 3 cents a pounds in the money of the United States, can be sold in New York for 20 cents a pound; and

Whereas to overcome the cheap production from abroad and prevent the European farmer from selling his dairy products in the United States, in ruinous competition with the American farmer: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to place a higher tariff on dairy products in order to protect the American farmer against foreign competition; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

THOS. J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report submitted by the New York Stock Exchange Reform Committee of the Manhattan Board of Commerce to the president and members of the board of directors relative to activities of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate pursuant to the resolution (S. Res. 84) to investigate the practice of "short selling" of listed securities upon stock exchanges and its effect on actual values (agreed to on March 4, 1932), together with a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Manhattan Board of Commerce, requesting the Senate to proceed immediately to investigate the activities of its Banking and Currency subcommittee in investigating the New York Stock Exchange and other stock exchanges, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I present a certified copy of a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey memorializing Congress to appropriate sufficient funds to carry out the provisions of the national defense act of 1920.

The concurrent resolution was ordered to lie on the table and, under the rule, to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE OF NEW JERSEY,
Statehouse, Trenton, N. J.

Concurrent resolution adopted January 30, 1933

Whereas the platforms of the two great political parties of this Nation advocate the maintenance of an adequate system of national defense; and

Whereas the people of New Jersey have ever been in the front rank when the safety of this Nation has been endangered; and

Whereas the Organized Reserve will, in case of a national emergency, constitute by far the largest component of the Army of the United States and should therefore receive proper training and equipment; and

Whereas the Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, a patriotic body of citizens of whom the great majority have had active service in the Army of the United States during the late war, have requested the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and the Senate of the Congress of the United States to appropriate sufficient funds to carry out the training of the Organized Reserve for the fiscal year 1934: Then be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of New Jersey (the House of Assembly concurring), That the Congress be, and it hereby is, requested to appropriate sufficient funds to carry out the provisions of the national defense act of 1920 and its accompanying legislation, so that the program of the War Department may be effectively carried out; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby instructed to forward certified copies of this resolution, signed by the president and secretary of the senate and the speaker and clerk of the house, to the following: The President of the United States, and United States Senate, the House of Representatives, the Senators and Members of Congress from the State of New Jersey.

A. CROZER REEVES,

Attest:

O. F. VAN CAMP,
Secretary of the Senate.
CHARLES A. OTTO, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Assembly.

Attest:

ROBERT W. PURDY,
Clerk of the House of Assembly.

THE WORLD COURT

Mrs. CARAWAY presented a resolution adopted by the Arkansas Baptist State Convention at Little Rock, Ark., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Arkansas Baptist State Convention in Little Rock, November 15, 1932, unanimously passed the following resolution:

Whereas it is peculiarly appropriate for the Baptists of Arkansas, through their representatives in annual convention, to express their deep interest in the cause of world peace; and

Whereas the question of American participation in the World Court has been pending for six years and the United States, although among the first to recommend the establishment of a permanent court of international justice to the rest of the world in 1899, now remains the only large nation, with the exception of Russia, that is outside the court; and

Whereas this is not a party question, since both major party platforms of this year call for completing the adherence of the United States to the World Court; and

Whereas it will be obviously difficult to reach a record vote on ratification of the pending treaties at the coming short session of the Senate, which adjourns on March 4, unless the treaties are taken up early in this session: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Arkansas Baptist State Convention, That we earnestly bespeak the influence of both of our Senators in getting the Senate to consider the World Court treaties early enough in the coming session to make it possible to reach a favorable vote before the session adjourns on March 4.

Respectfully submitted.

E. P. J. GARROTT, President.
J. B. LUCK, Secretary.

Mr. FESS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 5625) authorizing an appropriation to provide for the completion of the George Rogers Clark memorial at Vincennes, Ind., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1239) thereon.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 3009) to extend the boundaries of the Fremont National Forest, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1240) thereon.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13853) to authorize the merger of the Georgetown Gaslight Co. with and into Washington Gas Light Co., and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1241) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 15th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

S. 220. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Van Camp Sea Food Co. (Inc.);

S. 3438. An act authorizing adjustment of the claim of Lindley Nurseries (Inc.);

S. 4673. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the trustees of the Female Orphan Asylum in Georgetown, and the Washington City Orphan Asylum in the District of Columbia," approved May 24, 1828, as amended by act of June 23, 1874;

S. 4694. An act to amend section 812 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia;

S. 5289. An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to reappoint George N. Nicholson in the police department of said District; and

S. J. Res. 248. Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 14, 1933.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DALE:

A bill (S. 5645) for the relief of Anna Elizabeth Rice Denison; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A bill (S. 5646) granting a pension to Catherine Davis Broughton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BLACK:

A bill (S. 5647) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of the State of Alabama to construct a bridge across Elk River between Lauderdale and Limestone Counties, Ala.," approved February 16, 1928; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. METCALF:

A bill (S. 5648) granting an increase of pension to Lena Hook (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 5649) granting certain lands to Salt Lake City, Utah; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 5650) for the relief of Wayne Smallwood Vetterlein; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 255) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to sell surplus coal at nominal prices for distribution to the needy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. REED, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7232) providing for settlement of claims of officers and enlisted men for extra pay provided by act of January 12, 1899, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RELIEF FOR THE UNEMPLOYED—AMENDMENTS

Mr. WAGNER submitted amendments, and also an amendment in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ISSUANCE OF STAMPED MONEY CERTIFICATES, ETC.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PRODUCTION COSTS OF COTTON FISHING NETS AND NETTING

Mr. AUSTIN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 361), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That the United States Tariff Commission is hereby authorized and directed to investigate for the purpose of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 the differences in cost of production between the domestic article or articles and competitive foreign article or articles, and to report at the earliest practical date on the following items:

Cotton fishing nets and cotton fishing netting, classifiable under paragraph 923 of the tariff act of 1930.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE MEMORIAL SERVICES IN HONOR OF CALVIN COOLIDGE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 42) to compile, print, and bind the proceedings of Congress in connection with the exercises in memory of the late President Calvin Coolidge, which were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen"; in line 9, to strike out "eight" and insert "five"; and in line 10, to strike out "seventeen" and insert "ten."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this concurrent resolution provides for printing the bound volumes of the memorial exercises in honor of former President Calvin Coolidge. The House has reduced the number of volumes that may be printed. That reduction is agreeable to me; and I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION—REPEAL OF PROHIBITION

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. BLAINE'S motion that the Senate proceed to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 211) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in all that has been said by the eminent Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and my good friend the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] I am in hearty accord. The incident at Miami was deplorable; the entire country is shocked and grieved.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the Senator, who is a good lawyer, whether, in his judgment, there could not be some additional protection accorded to the man who occupies the Presidency of the country by the imposition of a more drastic penalty upon those who undertake to do a dastardly deed and yet fail, and by the fact of failure are relieved of the penalty that otherwise would be administered?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator means the death penalty?

Mr. FESS. Yes; whether it is not feasible to undertake some additional protection to the high office of the Presidency.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not know what the result would be, Mr. President, but, so far as I am personally concerned, I believe that anybody who attempts to assassinate the President of the United States or the President elect of the United States ought to suffer the death penalty.

I desire now, Mr. President, to discuss the joint resolution which is pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, for the past three days we have been discussing the question of whether or not intoxicating alcoholic beverages should be permitted to return legally. Three valuable days, three days during every one of the 24 hours of each of which untold thousands of people in America have been crying for bread, have been wasted in an academic discussion of a resolution that can have no effect possibly for the next 2, 3, 4, or 5 years. While measures are before this body that, if enacted into law, would provide relief for suffering humanity in America and alleviate agricultural conditions that are well-nigh intolerable, we continue to discuss the question of booze and the American saloon and whether or not they shall be tolerated in the future. We fiddle while the Nation burns, discussing a resolution which, if adopted, can only bring more misery to the country, and fail to consider measures that would unquestionably bring relief to millions of people under the American flag.

Mr. President, let nobody be deceived. This resolution is not for submission. Any one voting for the adoption of this resolution votes for the return of the American saloon with all its evils.

I have heard that some legislators occasionally believe that when they vote to submit an amendment of this kind somehow or other they are relieved of any responsibility either way. They take a neutral position. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, whoever votes for the joint resolution now before the Senate votes directly and deliberately for the return of the saloon. No other interpretation can be placed upon any vote in the affirmative. Not only that, but whoever votes for the adoption of this joint resolution requests the people in the State from which he comes to support that vote when the question comes up for decision by the various Commonwealths.

Mr. President, I understand perfectly well that anything I may say on this subject will doubtless have little effect. I assume it will influence no votes in this body; but I should feel myself derelict in duty did I not present to the Senate and to the country some observations that suggest my own line of reasoning with reference to this problem.

For years it has been a usual thing to see men, and women, too, going up and down the country insisting on the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, but also insisting equally as emphatically that they were against the return of the saloon. Evidently most of these advocates of repeal had their tongues in their cheeks when they made those pious statements. "Oh, no," said they; "we must never have the saloon again. We are opposed to the saloon." Even the Association Against the Eighteenth Amendment continuously stated their opposition to the saloon or its return; but, Mr. President, here we have the saloon back again.

This measure provides for the return of the saloon, pure and unadorned; and evidently the organized interests who have been advocating the repeal of the eighteenth amendment have used the lash and, notwithstanding their protestations to the contrary, have insisted that the saloon must come back. Out must go the eighteenth amendment. In must come the American saloon; and by a vote yesterday of 33 to 32 the Members of this body voted for its return. No other interpretation can be placed on that vote; and section 3 was stricken from the joint resolution.

"Happy days are coming back"; there is no doubt about it, Mr. President. One campaign pledge will be redeemed. We will have the American saloon back, and, presumably, happy days; but the "happy days" we sing about will be only a smoke screen, for back of that screen will be misery, human misery, far worse than it is to-day.

The question of the saloon has been with us always. It is nothing new. From the beginning of the Government we have had the liquor question and the saloon problem.

Mr. President, the first difficulty we had, in the way of revolt, after the Government was organized, was the saloon rebellion, the Whisky Rebellion, at the very beginning of Washington's administration; and we have had a whisky rebellion from then until now. This question has been in politics throughout all those years; and let no one here to-day think for a second that this joint resolution will take it out of politics. There is a right side and a wrong side, and in the end the right side will prevail.

For 133 years the American people tried to live with the saloon. I go further: For 133 years the American people did everything in their power to tolerate the liquor traffic. Local option was tried; license, State control, and every method the genius of man could invent was undertaken to find ways and means for living with the saloon, but all to no avail. It besotted manhood everywhere; destroyed homes; befouled womanhood and childhood; it controlled politics and corrupted government. Throughout those years State after State went dry, and the breweries and distilleries shipped their wares from wet States into dry States with impunity. They positively would not obey the law. There was no question about it. Finally the American people, discovering that the American saloon refused to be law-abiding, that it refused to yield to legal control, rose in their might and wrote prohibition into the basic law of the land in the form of the eighteenth amendment, and there it has remained until this day.

Now we propose—and I assume the votes are here to do it—we propose at 3 o'clock this afternoon to repeal that amendment as far as this body can do so. Ah, but, Mr. President, we go further. We not only propose to repeal the amendment but we propose to restore the saloon—the same saloon that all the liquor apologists during the past 12 years have insisted should never return; and we find a majority in this body for the restoration of that very saloon.

Mr. President, as soon as we bring back the saloon we shall have 48 State boundaries to police and patrol. One of the favorite arguments of the apologists for the liquor traffic during the past few years has been that the eighteenth amendment could not be enforced because we had the great Canadian boundary up there to the north, Mexico and the Gulf of Mexico on the south, the Atlantic Ocean on the east, and the Pacific on the west. It was impossible, they said, to enforce the law; and so rational, so reasonable are they, apparently so logical, that now they propose to add 48 more boundaries to those 4, and expect the American people to believe that in some manner or other it will be easier now to enforce the law and to patrol all of those additional boundaries than it was originally to patrol the four.

Mr. President, I am bound to say that the revenue will be disappointing. I do not think anybody expects any considerable revenue to come from this measure. I think the incoming administration will be utterly disheartened when they find how pitifully little money they get out of this traffic. The controlling reason is not revenue. It is twofold: First, to bring it back so that the thirsty may be supplied with little effort and, second, to transfer the income taxes from organized wealth to the backs of the beer drinkers of the country, those who have little means. That is the purpose. That means that more of the stuff will have to be drunk than is being consumed now, of course; and where is the money coming from to buy it, with 12,000,000 men walking the streets looking for work, with nothing to do, with no bread for themselves and their families? How are they going to get money to buy booze?

No; the revenue will be disappointing; but one result will come, Mr. President, and come immediately. As soon as this measure goes on the books, if ever, and if it requires some time for its ratification, if ever, I assume the beer bill will come before us and be promptly passed by the incoming Congress. That will mean that a saloon will be established within six months on every street corner throughout the country in all the cities, as they were before the eighteenth amendment; and then America will go on a spree the like of which was never heard of before. Everybody who can get the money with which to purchase, will drink—the young, the old, the rich, and the poor. This thing called prohibition has been so widely advertised and publicized that everybody will seek out liquor to learn more about it. It will not be safe to go on the streets, and everybody knows it, with 32,000,000 automobile drivers in the land. It will not be safe to ride on the railways, to say nothing of the air and aviation. That will be one of the inevitable results, Mr. President. Then the pendulum will swing back, back, beyond any question of a doubt, toward decency.

Of course, the American people will be disgusted with the saloon, as they were for 133 years. There never was a period when they were not; and, of course, as soon as they become thoroughly disgusted with it, the sentiment will change; the people will rise again in their wrath, and out the saloon will go. There is no question about that.

This legislation will not take the saloon out of politics; it will put it back into politics. Bootleggers will continue to bootleg; illicit distillers will continue to distill illicitly; and illicit brewers will continue to ply their trade. Nothing will be bettered.

Mr. President, I do not criticize any of my colleagues in the slightest degree. They have as much right to their views as I have to mine. But I am wondering whether it does not make them dizzy sometimes dodging from one side of the street to the other every time the wind changes. It would give me the "jitters" if I had to change my position on this great moral question every time it looked as if there were a little flurry in public sentiment.

Mr. President, I should prefer to find the right side, a position which my conscience would assure me was correct, and then take my stand there regardless of politics, understanding full well that if the winds of public sentiment blew away from me sooner or later they would be bound to come back, and if they never did, then it would be no tragedy to anybody but myself, and that would amount to little.

Mr. President, I want to observe also, while I am on my feet, that the nineteenth amendment is the next in order. Let the good women of America take warning. There is no question in the world but that the warfare now will begin against the nineteenth amendment.

Mr. President, I went through the lobby committee's investigation three years ago with my distinguished friend the late Senator Caraway, of Arkansas, who was the honored chairman of that committee. We had before the committee the so-called wet leaders. We had before us those who were leading the movement against the eighteenth amendment. We interrogated them all, and with frankness that practically amounted to effrontery they charged that the nineteenth amendment enfranchising the women of the country was a mistake, that it ought to be repealed, and that if they could bring it about they would have it repealed. It is all in the record of the hearings for any Senator who desires to see for himself. Let the women of America beware!

There are other amendments in the Constitution which safeguard the liberties of our people; which make it impossible for men to be sent to their death without fair trial, which gives every citizen the right to be tried for any offense by 12 of his peers, his neighbors, by a jury. All of the rights of the American people are safeguarded in that document known as the Constitution of the United States.

It is not safe to tinker with the Constitution. We never have done so. In 144 years of glorious history we have never yet repealed an amendment which went into the Constitution after the people had sanctioned it, and I submit that it is dangerous to tamper with the basic law. If the eighteenth amendment should be repealed, the nineteenth would be next in order. Then some one would want another amendment out, and the first thing we knew, the safeguards of freedom for the American people would be destroyed.

Mr. President, before the lobby committee to which I have referred correspondence was read; it is all in the RECORD, one letter from Irénée du Pont, as I remember—it was one of the du Ponts, and I think it was Irénée—to one of his friends stated in substance that the reason why he was so actively against the eighteenth amendment was that he wanted to restore beer, and that if beer could be restored, it would save one of his corporations alone $10,000,000 annually in income taxes, because the tax would be transferred to the beer drinkers of America.

Who are the people who have brought this thing about? I say that it is a group of not to exceed 75 millionaires in America. They have furnished all the money for poisoning American public opinion on this question, and it is all in the record, if any of my friends desire to see it, as a result of the disclosures before the lobby committee in 1930.

Mr. President, regardless of politics, I purpose to take my stand. I refuse to dodge around back and forth on this question. My own opinion is that the American saloon is an evil second to none that might be conjured up in one's imagination. Therefore I shall certainly do everything in my power to prevent its return, and, of course, vote against the pending joint resolution.

May I not, before resuming my seat, read a few excerpts from a statement published by the Country Editor Publishing Co. (Inc.) under the heading "The Poor Man Pays the Bill." I read:

> In considering present conditions there may be some comfort in the reflection that probably no social system can be so devised as to render it immune to attacks from its predatory elements. The whole mass, as a matter of fact, is inherently selfish and, therefore, cohesive; otherwise it would disintegrate, every separate unit would strike out for itself, and anarchy would ensue. So, however idealistic the original conception may be, the scheme must be worked out practically by reconciling the idealism toward which the race is eternally striving with those other provisions which are indispensable to the physical existence of each individual.
> There ought not, of course, to be any material subversion of the aspirations toward higher moral levels such as we are at present experiencing. There ought not to be in the political field any complete surrender by the legislative branch to the least desirable constituents of the population such as seems to be impending as soon as the new Congress can be brought into action.
> This surrender, it can be plainly seen, is infectious. The politician in local as well as in national affairs is misled by the talkativeness of the almighty dollar. The still, small voice of the moral sense of the Nation is drowned by the lusty-lunged mouthpieces of organized wealth.
> And organized wealth is not concerned with the moralities of the situation. It traffics in what it considers more tangible merchandise; it carries out its purpose by playing upon the weaknesses of human nature, and it thrives best, therefore, when the moral sense of the Nation is in suspension.
> The most disturbing feature, however, will be its (the new Congress) subservience to the crowd that temporarily has the whip handle and is using the lash mercilessly on everyone who dares to oppose it. This crowd is meeting with surprising success mainly because for the time being the political influence of those who have sought to guide the Nation into a cleaner moral atmosphere is at a low ebb. In reality their following represents by far the majority of the population, but they have been rendered inarticulate, and therefore demoralized, by the power of huge aggregations of wealth in the hands of a few men, functioning first in the national conventions and now at the Capitol in Washington.
> These men have made no secret of their intentions. Indeed, their chief spokesman, testifying before a congressional committee, boasted that his financial backers represented more than $10,000,000,000 of corporate and individual wealth. In the face of such an offensive it is not strange that the voice of the churches has been silenced. It is not strange that the big dailies have the effrontery to refer to these religious organizations as a collection of bigots and hypocrites. The almighty dollar does not believe in mincing words while it drives its chariot exultantly through the "common herd" on the road to its objective. It is not afflicted with a troublesome conscience. Those who will not get out of the way it destroys.
> It would seem so. The megaphone of the rich and powerful is calling loudly for liquor, and more liquor, so that the Budget may be balanced by making the poor man pay through the nose as he gulps down his schooner of lager and stands, maudlin drunk, at the bar, sumptuously furnished for him by the manipulators of $10,000,000,000 worth of the country's wealth.
> Balance the Budget with the nickels of the poor! That is the rich man's cry to-day. The billions lent to Europe were money poured into a rat hole. Therefore, let the poor man foot the bill as the saloon keeper rings up on his cash register the money that should have gone into shoes and stockings for the youngsters, and warm clothing, nourishing food, and wholesome amusements.
> The power of money, the saloon, unbridled greed, distillery, and brewery profits on the one hand, and, on the other, the country parsonage, the little red school house, the institution of the family, the protection of the children, the ideals of virtuous womanhood. Surely, it is an unequal struggle, a humiliating spectacle, a denial of inspiration and of leadership, a perversion of the destiny of a great people.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned I shall stand on the side I believe to be the right side. Others, of course, will make their own decisions. I shall vote against the repeal resolution.

Mr. GLASS obtained the floor.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, on last July 16 the Senate voted on Senate Joint Resolution 202 offered by me and by a recorded vote of 37 yeas to 21 nays decided to make it the order of business. Subsequently it was displaced by an appropriation bill. I have now offered it as a substitute for the pending Senate Joint Resolution 211.

I had hoped, Mr. President, to discuss the question in a practical way. I have never in either House of Congress in a service of 30 years felt it desirable to speak only for home consumption. If the Senate has no desire to hear these grave matters discussed I am not going to exhaust my reserve strength or that of the Senate either by undertaking a discussion of the question. Therefore, with a meager attendance of Senators, I shall accordingly abbreviate as much as possible my intended exposition of Senate Joint Resolution 202.

Mr. President, I have never voted anything but the prohibition ticket in my life when the issue was live and practical. I am not a zealot on the subject, but whenever opportunity has afforded I have invariably voted to banish intoxicating drinks. However, I realize, as other observant persons must realize, that the experiment of national prohibition seems to have proven an utter failure. What the causes may be, no man may accurately say. There are a multiplicity of them and they are of a varied nature. One of them in my considered judgment is the fact that moral lepers and statutory criminals have had the effrontery to assume leadership of the moral forces in the country. I think that fact has made a tremendous contribution to the reaction throughout the United States against prohibition as a national problem. There are some few things worse than liquor. But in any event, whatever the causes are, whatever their nature, every observant person must know that there has been this reaction.

There has been a tremendous demand for a resubmission of the question to the States for further determination. It has always been my view that there is just as much reason and equity in the general demand for resubmission of the prohibition problem as there was in the demand in the first instance for the submission of the eighteenth amendment to the States for ratification or rejection. Therefore, reluctantly I have joined the forces which are demanding a resubmission of the question.

I was on the platform committee of the national Democratic convention at Chicago, and there was no difference of judgment as to the desirability of submitting the question to the States for further consideration. The Democratic convention of my own State, to which I owe primary allegiance and of which I am their representative here in the Senate and not of any national convention, declared for a resubmission of the question. But concurrently with that declaration the Virginia Democratic State platform denounced the return of the saloon and by implication advocated a submission in the form of a proclamation against the return of the saloon.

The Democratic National Convention at Chicago denounced the return of the saloon. It may be said that by implication at least it advocated action by the States against the return of the saloon and that is granted. But that declaration, I contend, did not necessarily preclude a constitutional reservation against the return of the saloon. On the other hand, the Republican National Convention at Chicago textually and in terms demanded a constitutional reservation against the return of the saloon.

In all the last campaign, so far as I was able to observe—because I was not permitted on account of physical disability to participate actively in the campaign—it was urgently insisted by candidates and the press that there should not be a return of the saloon. So that, far from naked repeal of the eighteenth amendment being the commanding issue of the campaign, it was not an issue of the campaign, the differences between the two parties being so indistinguishable that the widespread contention was that the liquor question was utterly subordinated and the economic issues of the campaign were predominant.

For myself I have said, and now repeat, that I do not attach any great degree of sanctity to platform declarations as contradistinguished from a Senator's obligation under oath to follow his own judgment and his conscience in matters of this kind. I note that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate attached no sanctity to convention declarations, either the Democrats or the Republicans on that committee, for they utterly rejected and disregarded the textual declaration of both the Republican and the Democratic national platforms, in that Senate Joint Resolution 211, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, provides not for the submission to conventions called solely for the purpose of deciding this question but rather to legislatures, as has been the invariable practice. Therefore, if the distinguished lawyers composing the Judiciary Committee of this body may thus lightly brush aside party platform declarations, the laymen among us may as readily and as safely disregard those declarations in other respects. However, it is not my purpose to disregard them materially. On the contrary, it is my considered view that unless we shall regard the declarations of both major parties it will prove impossible to submit this question at all to the States.

Let us consider that phase of the subject for a moment. Some of us on this side have stressed party declarations. Let us assume that there is a certain sanctity about such declarations. Why should the Democrats assume that the Republicans owe less allegiance to the declarations of their party platforms than we presume to avow for the declarations of the Democratic National Convention?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Republican platform expressly declares that as to this particular subject no one may be bound by the platform pronouncement.

Mr. GLASS. The Republican platform expressly declares that while in dealing "with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic," the States shall be allowed "to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine," such dealing shall always be subject "to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition may exist and safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and attendant abuses."

Mr. BULKLEY. But the platform goes on to declare——

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I know.

Mr. BULKLEY. The platform goes on to declare that no Republican need be bound by its declaration on this subject, and that it shall not come in conflict with anybody's conscience.

Mr. GLASS. I do not intend that my party platform shall ever come in conflict with either my judgment or my conscience, if the Senator from Ohio wants my view on the subject.

However, to return to the point: I say if submission be desired, it is my view that we can never get it except by regarding the platforms of both major parties, for the simple reason that the Republicans have now but one majority in the Senate, the Democrats being in the minority, and, if the Republicans observe their party platform, where are we going to get the necessary two-thirds to submit the question? We shall not have it in the next Senate. Where are we going to get it?

Something has been said on the other side of the Chamber about keeping faith with party declarations. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], now absent, I regret to say, undertook to charge the Democrats in the Senate with violation of their party platform, and yet he himself has violated his own party platform in his action and his votes here. I am a genuine submissionist; I believe that the American people in the respective 48 States are entitled to the privilege of voting on this question again; and it is because I do believe in submission that I want to have passed a resolution that has some prospect and hope of obtaining the required two-thirds vote in each House of the Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am wondering if the Senator would be willing to change his amendment, in the nature of a substitute, beginning in line 7, page 2, where it reads:

> The Congress and the several States, Territories, and possessions shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

In other words, I do not like the "concurrent power" provision.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator when the proper time arrives I will be glad to make any reasonable concession that will assure us the prospect of submitting this question to the States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well. I should like, however, to have the Senator devote a little thought to this phase of the question. I recognize, of course, that the Congress has power to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit the movement of wet goods into dry States and that sort of thing. That is in the law now; we do not need to express that in a new amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. But as to the control of the saloon and the provision of the proposal the Senator offers with reference to the sale on the premises, it seems to me that that might well be left entirely to the States and not have the power concurrently vested in the Federal Government and the States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to say a word, in view of what has just been stated by the Senator from Florida in relation to the second paragraph of the joint resolution as tendered by the committee.

It is true that the original Constitution authorizes Congress to prohibit the transfer of intoxicating liquors in interstate commerce. It is held, however, that that authority simply indicates the intention to have commerce free except as Congress may otherwise direct. It has been held that under the existing Constitution the right obtains on the part of any citizen to pass his goods into another State, and they remain under the protection of the Federal Constitution until they actually reach the hands of the consignee; so that they can not be stopped at the State line nor there fall under the jurisdiction of the State authorities, but the goods will not fall under the jurisdiction of the State authorities until they actually get into the possession of the consignee who may live in the center of the State. Meanwhile all manner of opportunity is afforded for the diversion of the intoxicating liquors from the consignee to whom they are addressed. Likewise, even then, the intoxicating liquor is protected by the commerce clause; if it remains on the siding in the car of the transportation company, it still remains under that protection, and if it goes into a warehouse belonging to the transportation company it remains under the protection of the Federal statute, and is immune from any control by State statutes until it actually reaches the possession of the consignee. The purpose of the provision in the resolution reported by the committee was to make the intoxicating liquor subject to the laws of the State once it passed the State line and before it gets into the hands of the consignee as well as thereafter. It was so decided in a case reported in One hundred and seventieth United States Reports, with which, I think, the profession generally is not particularly familiar.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in my own interpretation of the resolution as I have presented it, there can be no consignee of intoxicating liquors in a dry State. Liquors may be shipped across a State in interstate commerce from one wet State to another wet State, but the resolution as I have drafted it prohibits the shipment of intoxicating liquors into a State whose laws prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation of liquors. So I have met the objection that we are undertaking to interfere with interstate commerce as between States which authorize the manufacture, transportation, and sale of liquors; but there can be no consignee in dry territory under the terms of my proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, at every point in the presidential campaign when submission of this question was discussed, and whenever the objection was raised as to the return of the saloon, assurances were given that both parties, with unexampled unanimity, were opposed to the return of the saloon. The Democratic national platform, in spirit and by suggestion—indeed, by denunciation—objected to the return of the saloon. The Republican platform in text insisted upon a constitutional guaranty against the return of the saloon. So my joint resolution complies with both the Democratic and the Republican platforms; and that is the only way you are ever going to get the question submitted at all, as it requires a two-thirds vote. Moreover, not only is it the only way you are ever going to get it submitted but it is the only way you are ever going to get it ratified by 36 States of the Union.

The Anti-Saloon Leagueites rode to a precipitate downfall because of their spirit of intolerance and tyranny, manifested in various offensive ways on every occasion. Now some of these gentlemen who want to repeal the eighteenth amendment would better beware lest they find themselves riding to a downfall. They are manifesting a spirit that is calculated to arrest the reaction that we have had against the eighteenth amendment, and that will make it impossible to get 36 States to ratify the proposed repeal of the eighteenth amendment. It is my considered judgment that they will never get it on earth unless we make a constitutional reservation against the return of the saloon.

Yesterday there was stricken out of Senate Joint Resolution 211 the almost attenuated constitutional guaranty against the return of the saloon. If that policy is to be pursued, I predict now and here that you will never get two-thirds of both Houses of Congress even to submit the question, and much less is the likelihood that you will ever prevail upon 36 States of this Union to vote for a proposition that involves the return of the vile institution called the liquor saloon.

The intemperance of the saloon was the least objection to it. It was the breeding place of crime and immorality and vulgarity and profanity of every description. It was the rendezvous of the immoral and criminal elements. Its effrontery was unparalleled, because it sought to control and for a time succeeded in controlling the politics of the community, of the State, and largely of the Nation, so that any man who had a worthy aspiration to serve his people must first kotow to the liquor league in his State. Not only that, but if you submit this question without a constitutional guaranty against the return of this vile institution you will witness in this country a campaign such as we have never had, not even in 1928, when the presidential nominee of the Democratic Party over and over again proclaimed himself in antagonism to the return of the liquor saloon.

Ask the extreme Anti-Saloon Leaguers in what form they would prefer to have this question submitted, and those who are honest among them—and God knows there are enough of them who are not—will tell you that they would rather have it submitted for naked repeal, without the remotest constitutional guaranty against the return of the saloon; and why? Because it would enable them to stir the passions, to appeal to the emotions, rather than to the minds, of their people. It would enable them to organize all of the churches of this country again; and Heaven knows that their actions have already done harm enough to the churches of the country, and to religion itself. But, thus enabling them to appeal to the emotions of the church people, nobody can convince me that you will ever be able to get three-fourths of the States to ratify this amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. REED. May I preface the question by saying that I am in sympathy with every word the Senator has thus far uttered on this subject.

A good many Senators are obviously bothered by the continuance of Federal control in this matter; and while they are anxious to see the saloon outlawed, they would like to see it done by prohibition on State action rather than continuing this unsuccessful Federal effort to carry its police power into the States. I am wondering whether the Senator feels that the last sentence in section 1 of his amendment is essential. That is the one which gives concurrent power to Congress.

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not think it is essential. If I could be brought to believe that the joint resolution stands a better chance of passage by the elimination of that sentence, I should be glad to eliminate it, because the balance of the joint resolution gives us a constitutional prohibition against the return of the saloon.

Mr. REED. That is just what I want to see; and the question of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] a little while ago seemed to be animated by the same thought I had—that there are many votes that would be secured for the joint resolution if that grant of concurrent power to Congress were eliminated.

Mr. GLASS. That being so, I should be perfectly willing to eliminate that one sentence from the measure. All I want is a constitutional guaranty against the return of this abominable saloon system of dispensing intoxicating liquors—that is all—and if we write it into the Constitution I assume that no State would ever even undertake to violate the text of the Constitution by licensing a saloon.

Mr. REED. Obviously, if it did, its licensing law would be invalid.

Mr. GLASS. Why, absolutely so.

Let me recall the fact that it was Mr. Woodrow Wilson's idea that the administration of any law that we might have on the subject—it was his idea that the administration of the Volstead Act except as to interstate shipments of liquor and the importations of liquor should be confided to the respective States, with their varying habits, with their tempers and their facilities for knowing the habits of their own people, and with their greater ability to enforce the law. Less than three months before he died Mr. Wilson wrote a proposed declaration on this very subject for incorporation in the platform of his party at the succeeding convention, in which he declared that it would require all of the power and resources and ingenuity available to the Federal Government to do the one thing of preventing interstate traffic in intoxicating liquors and the importation of intoxicating liquors, and that the States themselves could more effectively and certainly enforce the letter of the Volstead Act than the Federal Government could.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator may recall that when the eighteenth amendment was originally passed through this body it did not contain any provision for concurrent power to enforce its provisions, and that language was added in the House as a concession to the spirit of State rights, which prevailed probably more dominantly there than elsewhere.

I have always felt myself that probably it was a mistake to put in the original amendment the provision for concurrent power, and for that reason I am somewhat impressed with the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that that language is not only not necessary but probably unwise.

Mr. GLASS. It is entirely agreeable to me to omit that language.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. REED. Then, passing that point, if the Senator will permit another question, it seems to me that it was made clear by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and other previous speakers that the phraseology of section 2 of the joint resolution as it came from the committee is more satisfactory than the language in the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. I am wondering if, in the long run, we would not do best by inserting the prohibition against the saloon in section 3, to be added to what the committee has already put in regarding transportation into the dry States.

Mr. GLASS. That has been brought to my attention, and I am unable to see that that course would be any more effective than that proposed in my joint resolution. The language is simple. It is a layman's language. The lawyers find distinctions which I have not comprehension enough to follow and to understand.

Mr. REED. We can not help doing it when the Supreme Court puts those distinctions down as part of the law of the land.

Mr. GLASS. Not even the Supreme Court can help doing it, because on important matters its decisions are generally 4 to 5. But I am not willing to make the alteration suggested. Of course, it is for the Senate to say. I think the resolution as prepared, with the modification first suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, meets the issue in every respect.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator conceive that, by the modification suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the Congress would be deprived of jurisdiction to enforce the provision carried in the section above?

Mr. GLASS. I want the Federal Government to have as little to do with the matter as possible. I never relished the idea; and, as I stated a while ago, President Wilson never relished the idea, of sending Federal employees into the States, without any understanding of the habits and temperaments of the people of the several States, to enforce a law, and I want to exclude the Federal Government, as far as it is practicable to do so, from having anything to do with this matter. But I do insist upon a constitutional guaranty against the return of the saloon.

The candidates for the Presidency either meant what they said or they did not mean what they said when they stated that they were opposed to the saloon. The political parties, in State convention and in national convention, either meant what they said or were merely thundering in the index to deceive the people when they stated they were opposed to the return of the saloon. If everybody is, as has been suggested, opposed to the return of the saloon, what possible objection can there be to asserting it in the Constitution of the United States and letting the States govern themselves accordingly?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for one more statement?

Mr. GLASS. I believe the Senator from Ohio rose first.

Mr. BULKLEY. I was only going to suggest that I do not think that even by the acceptance of the modification proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania the Senator would avoid the problem of Federal enforcement in the respective States.

Mr. GLASS. I do not intend to avoid it completely. I intend that there shall be a constitutional prohibition against a return of the saloon, and a Federal court might invalidate a State law which undertook to disregard the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Absolutely, and it would be binding both on the States regarding action in their territory, and binding on us in Congress regarding the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and the other Territories.

Will the Senator permit me to say one more word?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. When the session opened to-day I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which section 3 was striken out last night. In view of the decision of the Senator from Virginia to omit that last sentence in section 1 of his amendment, while I would like now to make the motion, I will not ask that it be acted upon until after the disposition of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. GLASS. That is very good of the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator that the elimination of this concurrent provision in the Senator's resolution would leave his resolution entirely analogous to the provision of the Constitution which now forbids any State to pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract. While there is no jurisdiction in the instrument giving Congress concurrent power to enforce that provision, Congress could enforce it, and would do so in this case.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I want to get back to the vital point of this whole controversy; that is, does Congress want submission, or does it not want submission? That is the whole point. I have been unable to see how it is possible even to get submission, much less ratification, unless we regard the declarations of both of the major parties. How can any Senator on the other side vote against this Senate joint resolution I have proposed? It meets textually the Republican Party platform. How is any Senator on this side able to vote against it, when they overwhelmingly voted on July 16 last to take this resolution up and make it the order of the day, when there is nothing in the resolution which contravenes anything that is in the Democratic national platform, not a thing? It proposes to submit, and to submit, as I conceive, in the only way we can get submission. It meets the spirit of the declaration and the denunciation against the return of the saloon. We are not precluded from doing it simply because the declaration proceeded no further than to say, "We urge the States to enact laws against the return of the saloon."

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am one of those who voted to take up the Senator's resolution last July; but, of course, the resolution was subject to amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I respectfully differ from the Senator as to this resolution being in adequate compliance with the Democratic platform.

Mr. GLASS. I imagine that there are other Senators who disagree with me; but that does not cause me to relinquish my own view of the matter.

Mr. BULKLEY. I did not want it to appear that I thought the Senator's resolution was a compliance with the Democratic platform merely because many of us voted to take it up last July. Of course, we voted to take it up.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; it was not "of course" at all. I had the greatest difficulty in prevailing upon the Senate to take it up.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am speaking of those who want to get the amendment repealed. Naturally we voted to take up the Senator's resolution for consideration, but it was open to amendment, and to the offering of a substitute.

Mr. GLASS. I have great respect for the opinion of my colleague from Ohio, and always have had, in this body and in the other House, but I have not altered my own opinion that a mere harmless and ineffective declaration of a party platform which promises to urge the respective States to do something does not preclude us from doing something in a more effective way, and giving the people of this country a constitutional guaranty against the return of an evil institution which we all say everybody is opposed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator think there is a very essential difference, as a matter of party declaration, between the declaration of a platform in which the Democratic Party urges the States to take some particular action in dealing with this situation, and writing it into the Constitution of the United Staes?

Mr. GLASS. I say there is a difference, because I think the party-platform declaration was not worth the paper it was written on, and I think the amendment would be worth everything it says.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Just a moment ago the Senator from Virginia asked the question how the Senators upon the Republican side of the aisle could vote against the Senator's proposal. Speaking only for myself, I want to say that I do not propose to vote against his proposal; on the contrary, unless the Senator's proposal, or some other like reservation, shall be contained in the joint resolution, I shall be obliged to vote against submission at all.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and many Senators on the other side, and many on this side, occupy the same position.

I do not owe any supreme allegiance to a party declaration that had nothing on earth to do with my presence in the Senate. I was here as the representative of a sovereign State before a few people conspired in a national convention to get a declaration which suited themselves, and which is impossible of being effectuated, either in the Congress, in my judgment, or through an appeal to the States for ratification.

Submit the question of naked appeal to the American people, with the inevitable consequence—let Senators say what they will—that there will be a liquor saloon on every corner of every community, and in every filling station on every highway, and see whether 36 States can be persuaded to ratify any such proposal.

It is that sort of tyranny of spirit, that sort of mistaken feeling of domination, that almost literally destroyed the Anti-Saloon League, and wrought a damage to the churches and to religion that will not be repaired in the next half a century by the fervent prayers of people who are worthy to wear God's robes in his visible church. It is that sort of thing that destroyed those people, and you had better beware but that it is that sort of thing that will completely upset your plans for the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. President, I think I can say no more than I have said, as I feel that I could say no less than I have said, and I submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the purpose of the substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia is to prevent the return of the saloon. I share his views upon that subject. I do not wish to see the saloon resurrected. I have often said that the saloon was as dead as human slavery. I have often said that it had no more chance to rise from the dead than human slavery. I can not vote to falsify my own words. I can not help to roll the stone from its grave. I shall, therefore, vote for the Senator's substitute. But I feel obliged to say that, whether his substitute is adopted or rejected, owing to an obligation imposed upon me by the organized Democracy of Oklahoma, I can not vote for either of the resolutions.

Mr. President, I will now have read for the RECORD, rather than for Senators, a plank from the Democratic platform adopted in 1930 in Oklahoma, upon which I made my race for the Senate, and upon which I obtained my commission and the seat which I now hold.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

We pledge the people of Oklahoma that if the Democratic candidates for United States Senator and Congress are elected to Congress they will oppose the repeal of the eighteenth amendment or any effort to weaken the Volstead law, unless and until the people themselves, by their expressed will, shall have otherwise directed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the last phrase, "unless and until the people themselves, by their expressed will, shall have otherwise directed," was inserted at my instance and upon my own insistence. Otherwise this declaration, more or less iron-bound, as Senators see, would have been perpetual. Even had the people of Oklahoma in a referendum voted against national prohibition, this pledge as originally drawn would still have bound me. Had the Democracy of Oklahoma in convention assembled adopted a contrary declaration, this pledge would have bound me but for the addition of that phrase. But I interpreted it, and I think the people of Oklahoma interpreted it, to mean some action on the part of the State. I construed it that way, and I do not feel at liberty to disregard that sort of instruction.

I was not bound to accept the nomination on that platform, but I did. I could have renounced it and could have taken my chances, and if elected would not have been bound by this declaration. But I stated during the campaign that I would stand on this platform and carry out this pledge in good faith so long as it stood as the expressed will of the organized Democracy in Oklahoma. I therefore feel bound by this declaration. But for that declaration I would have been in a different situation; in view of the platform adopted at Chicago and in view of the ratification of that platform by the people of my State, I would have been at liberty to act otherwise; but in the circumstances I feel in conscience and in duty bound to obey such explicit instructions so solemnly laid upon me by the Democracy of my State.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am opposed to repeal of the eighteenth amendment. So is the State of Kansas, which I represent.

Mr. President, our first duty is to the hungry, the unemployed, the tax-ridden, the impoverished farmers, and other victims of this terrible depression.

I am opposed to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment because I am opposed to the return of the saloon. The wets claim they do not want saloons, but they have not yet told us how they will resume the traffic in liquor without saloons. In the old times the saloon brought untold misery and suffering in its wake, particularly to innocent women and children who had to pay the price for the appetites of husbands and fathers.

The presence of the saloon is a constant temptation to many men. It is a constant menace to the home and to the economic welfare of the women and children. I am unalterably opposed to its return.

Right at this time, in spite of the hue and cry, the tumult and the shouting, this Congress has more important things to consider than the proposed legalization of the liquor traffic.

Legalization of the liquor traffic will not make the liquor traffic law abiding. Whether legal or illegal, those who deal in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor will be lawless. The liquor traffic always has been essentially lawless, whether the traffic is recognized as legal and under regulation, or has been banned as illegal. It always has been lawless, always will be lawless.

Mr. President, the wets tell us that when liquor comes back it will end unemployment, produce prosperity, balance the Budget, make everybody happy; but it will not. We are constantly told that the country gave this Congress a mandate at the November election which directed the Congress to submit this repeal question to the States. Nothing took place in Kansas which could possibly be construed as a declaration for repeal. Every candidate on the State and congressional tickets in Kansas, Republican and Democrat, with one exception, ran on a prohibition platform. The one wet candidate was overwhelmingly defeated.

Right now I think bread is more important than beer. I have received a telegram from the executive board of the Rawlins County Farm Bureau. Rawlins County is in northwest Kansas. The telegram symbolizes the sentiment not only of Kansas but of practically the entire agricultural section of the great West. That telegram says:

We ask that you use your influence in insisting that a farm relief bill be given first consideration in this session of Congress and over any legislation affecting the eighteenth amendment.

That is exactly the stand I propose to take.

Understand, I am speaking from my viewpoint as a Kansan born and bred and as an American citizen who believes he holds the best interests of the people of this Nation at heart. This does not mean that I condemn those who have a different viewpoint but who equally believe they have the best interests of the people of this Nation at heart. Those persons and myself are just in disagreement, that is all. Each has a perfect right to his own convictions, his own belief, and has entire liberty of action to crystallize those convictions and beliefs into action, so far as I am concerned.

I am one of those who doubt that making it easier to obtain liquor would lessen the amount of drinking in the United States. In passing, let me say that some of the wets have been making at least one claim in the past few years that on its face is hypocritical. They assert they favor temperance; that repeal of the amendment and abolition of national prohibition enforcement would mean less drinking. That is not true. They want—or most of them want—more liquor, liquor more easily obtainable.

I doubt very much that making it easier to obtain liquor would lessen the amount of crime, for the very good reason that it never has lessened crime.

I am sure that making it easier to get liquor would increase the number of traffic accidents and all the troubles and miseries that liquor always has increased.

Mr. President, when, some 14 years ago, 46 States voted through their legislatures to place the eighteenth amendment in the Constitution it was not due to any sudden, overnight change of heart. Adoption of the eighteenth amendment was the culmination of many years of observation and experience; the result of testing many and various means for the control of liquor. It was the culmination of a long series of "noble experiments."

The States had tried, with high license, with local option, with State dispensaries, with other means, to make a law-abiding person of John Barleycorn. All these efforts had failed. The fact is John Barleycorn is not cut out for a law-abiding citizen. So the States and the people were looking for something better. They believed that with State and Federal regulation combined John could be looked after and guarded and held in restraint a little more closely in the public interest than he ever had been before.

A good start was made with prohibition. Then New York State, with a great liquor stronghold within its borders and a city government that never had obeyed any liquor law, went back on its agreement. New York early became a backslider. It repealed its State enforcement act and has insisted ever since that prohibition is a failure. A few other States in which the liquor interests and liquor politics have always been strongly intrenched followed New York's example in nullifying the Constitution.

Of course, this did not help the experiment in national prohibition, nor has it been helped by the constant stream of propaganda against the law that has come from that part of the country.

Frankly, I am for continuing the experiment nationally. We went through similar experiences in Kansas for 30 years before we had really effective prohibition enforcement. It must be admitted that national prohibition has not been entirely successful up to date; but I am satisfied, and the most authentic statistics we have all indicate, that prohibition is doing more good than harm—if it is doing harm. The records of the Treasury and of the Department of Justice, studied calmly and dispassionately, prove the increasing efficiency of the law's enforcement.

I do not believe we should expect to wipe out an age-old curse like the liquor evil by statutory law in a dozen years nor in a score of years. If we are really making progress, as in many respects we undoubtedly are, we should be encourage by this progress, not discouraged, and should proceed to make more progress.

It is said that in spite of prohibition a man can get a drink almost anywhere in the United States. Doubtless that is more or less true. Also a man may still commit murder anywhere in the United States, and many men do, although laws against murder have been on the statute books for ages.

Mr. President, if there is any ideal way of handling the liquor traffic I do not believe the world has yet discovered it. In Canada the wets told the people if they would repeal prohibition, lawlessness would decline. Statistics from the office of the Dominion's attorney general show that during the eight years, from 1923 to 1930, lawlessness in the Dominion increased from 18 to 153 per cent. Canada's jails have never been so full as they are now, nor her courts so crowded with business.

All over the world a colossal struggle is going on between right and wrong. Crime has increased everywhere. As the population of the world is larger than ever before, I doubt if it ever has witnessed so gigantic a contest between good and evil as is now taking place.

In this country the wets point to prohibition as the cause of this condition. In Great Britain it is laid to "the motor age" and to the war. In one of its reports the National Probation Commission declares that prohibition is not one of the five major causes of crime in the United States. This flatly contradicts the oft-repeated wet argument.

The World War had much to do with this mushroom growth of every kind of wickedness throughout the world. But conditions for its rapid development had long been rife, especially in our graft-ridden American cities.

Greed is responsible for most of our economic troubles. Greed always has been behind the liquor evil. A lifetime of observation has convinced me that we shall never get anywhere by temporizing with liquor. All our history shows we never have.

Speaking in New York City, March 29, 1919, Al Smith, then Governor of New York, said:

> The liquor interests have opposed stubbornly, for as many years back as I can remember, every attempt at the regulation of their business.

I wonder if Al Smith really believes those interests would be more amenable to control and regulation now, if they should be flushed with a victory over national prohibition?

If we make liquor a State rights problem, as it is proposed to do, provided three-fourths of the States agree, which is not at all certain in spite of the present hysteria on the question, would we not then have 48 prohibition problems instead of 1?

Now, Mr. President, I want to ask one other question: What have the wets to offer in place of national prohibition? So far, nothing except a return to conditions as they were before the days of national prohibition.

For years the wets have been protesting publicly and often that they are in favor of temperance; that they oppose the return of the saloon. The wets' only definite plan so far is the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I say that means the return of the saloon, and I am opposed to the return of the saloon.

Legalize and reinstate liquor to its old position before we had prohibition, and it will be only a matter of a short time until it will be flaunting its vices openly and publicly and gutterly on every street. Experience shows that the saloon, gambling den, and brothel go hand in hand; and the three, led by the saloon, not only debauch young and old but pollute the body politic, especially in cities, and breed corruption and racketeering.

The wet leaders well know that the moment liquor is legalized, both retailers and manufacturers will form the old-time political ring in order to "liberalize" and do away with whatever regulations and restrictions are placed upon their business. Bootleggers—who existed long before we had prohibition—are a corrupt element in the political life of some of our communities, but the bootlegger has much to learn in moral knavery and political skullduggery from the brewers, distillers, and saloon keepers of old days.

Mr. President, the wets are making a campaign of false pretences. They even claim legalization of the liquor traffic would help raise farm prices in this country—but the brewers propose to make beer from imported hops, mixed with some domestic production.

The farm organizations know better than this, and are much opposed to the move to destroy national prohibition. They know the small amounts of farm products used would be more than offset by the loss of dairy products alone. More men would buy more beer; fewer children would get milk.

Right here let me say that I not only am opposed to repeal of the eighteenth amendment but I am opposed to and will vote against any measure proposing to legalize the sale of beer of an increased alcoholic content ostensibly for the purpose of raising revenue. I shall oppose it first because I consider that is an attempt at legal nullification of the eighteenth amendment. I shall never support a program which nullifies my Government's Constitution.

In the second place, I am opposed to levying a beer expense of $3,000,000,000 upon the families of the American working men even though it does increase the revenues of the Federal Government a few hundred million dollars.

It is true we must get better farm prices if we are to recover from the economic depression, but beer and whisky will not bring them. My information is that a bushel of corn will produce 4 gallons of whisky. The farmer under the old system got 25 cents for his bushel of corn. It retailed at $16.40, of which Uncle Sam got $4.40, the manufacturer got $4, the retailer $7, and transportation costs were $1.15.

Again I say, Mr. President, that there is no help for agriculture in repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I want to submit a unanimous-consent agreement on the pending question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. To extend the time for debate?

Mr. WATSON. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended until 4.30 o'clock, and that no Senator shall be permitted to speak more than 10 minutes at any time from now on until that hour.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope that will be agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator restate his request?

Mr. WATSON. My request is that the time for debate be extended until 4.30 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. Why not put it "not later than 4.30"?

Mr. WATSON. From the number of Senators who have told me that they wish to speak, I think debate will run until 4.30. However, I will say not later than 4.30, and that no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes until that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLAINE. The present unanimous-consent agreement is to take a vote upon the resolution and all pending amendments or motions at 3 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON. I am now asking to set aside that agreement and substitute for it another unanimous-consent agreement, which may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator's unanimous-consent request refers only to the length of time a Senator may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana submits a unanimous-consent request that the order by which we were to vote to-day at 3 o'clock be vacated and that there be substituted therefor the agreement that debate shall continue until not later than 4.30 o'clock this afternoon, no Senator to speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes.

Mr. WATSON. And at 4.30 o'clock a vote shall be taken.

Mr. BLAINE. A vote on the resolution and all pending amendments and motions in relation thereto?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Indiana whether the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been consulted concerning the arrangement?

Mr. WATSON. He has not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The senior Senator from Maine, if the Senator will pardon me, is very anxious to leave the city to-night at 6 o'clock because of illness in his family. This morning he was very anxious to call up one of the appropriation bills after 3 o'clock. May I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that before the agreement is entered into he be given an opportunity to consult with the senior Senator from Maine?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he limit his request at this time to the suggestion that debate be limited so that no Senator shall be permitted to speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes.

Mr. WATSON. I am entirely agreeable to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] finds it necessary to leave the city on account of severe illness in his family—the very severe illness of a brother. He would like to obtain consideration of one of the appropriation bills before leaving, if it is possible to do so.

Mr. WATSON. I am in full sympathy with that suggestion, and I thank the Senator from Arkansas for making it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to limit speeches from now until 3 o'clock to 10 minutes, no Senator to speak more than once.

Mr. WATSON. I am not willing to say that debate shall close at 3 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The debate has been closed at 3 o'clock by an agreement under which we are now proceeding.

Mr. WATSON. I understand that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think if the Senator will modify his request so that speeches will be limited to 10 minutes, he will conserve the convenience of the Senate and the convenience of the Senator from Maine; and if that Senator, upon appearing in the Chamber, has no objection to the extension of time, I myself will not object; but this arrangement was made yesterday, and I do not feel that it ought to be changed now in the absence of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WATSON. I would agree with the Senator, except for the fact that this is a most important question and we are all entitled to discuss it; every Senator wants to explain his views and his vote and his attitude toward his national platform and toward the situation generally.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator persists in the request that he has made, I shall object to it——

Mr. WATSON. I shall not persist.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. For the reason that I have stated; but, if he will submit a request to limit debate to 10 minutes, so that no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes, I will not object to that.

Mr. WATSON. I have submitted that request.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I was going to say that unless my colleague is consulted I shall object to any modification of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask that the request may be stated.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have not heard the request; I have just come into the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that until 3 o'clock debate be limited to 10 minutes on the part of each Senator and that no Senator shall speak more than once. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, during all my service in Congress I have always voted for prohibition and all measures in support of prohibition. To-day I shall vote for this resolution to submit the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the States. In casting this vote I shall be entirely consistent. I have never changed my position as to voting on prohibition since I first came to Congress in 1914, nor shall I do so to-day.

At the election in 1914 the people of the State of Washington voted in their first referendum on prohibition, and in my campaign that year for election to the National House of Representatives I stated that, while I personally favored prohibition, if elected I would be the representative of the people in Congress; that, as such representative, I considered they were greater than I possibly could be; that when they went to the polls and legislated on any public question their will would be supreme, and that I would consider the vote of the majority at the polls to be a mandate which I would obey in Congress by voting on prohibition as they directed.

They voted dry. I kept my pledge with them by voting dry here in Congress.

In 1916 the people of the State of Washington voted again on prohibition on two referendum bills designed to weaken the prohibition laws of the State. They voted overwhelmingly dry, and in every campaign in which I have been a candidate since 1916 I have made the same pledge; namely, that, if reelected, I would vote in Congress on prohibition as the majority of the people of my State voted in a referendum.

In my last campaign, in 1928, when the wet issue was prominent, I stated that I considered the referendum votes of the people as an instruction to me to vote "dry," and that I would continue to vote "dry" unless and until the people by referendum vote changed their instructions.

During all these years I have kept that pledge by voting "dry" on every measure in behalf of prohibition that has come before Congress previous to this session.

But in 1932 we had in the State of Washington another referendum on the repeal of the prohibition laws. In that election the people in the referendum voted overwhelmingly "wet." That is a mandate for me to vote to submit the eighteenth amendment for repeal and to vote for such liberalization of the Volstead Act as is permissible under the Constitution. I shall so vote whenever these measures come before the Senate.

The people do not vote on the tariff, on taxes, on farm bills, or on the money question. They elect men to the House and Senate to pass on such legislation. On such questions I have always taken the responsibility of deciding how I should vote in conformity with the principles I have advocated and the pledges I have made in the past and for what I believed to be for the best interest of the people as a whole. This I shall continue to do.

If I were unwilling to keep my pledge to the men and women who elected me to carry out their will, as registered in the prohibition referendums of my State, I would consider myself faithless to my trust and unworthy of a seat in this body. To break faith with those whose votes I secured by such pledges would, in my estimation, be an embezzlement of power given me by the people, and I would consider such action little less than treason.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I can state my views in less than half the time that is permitted to me. I am one of those who have reluctantly become convinced that the prohibition experiment is a failure. I do not like to see us revert to the days which we knew before prohibition, the days of the saloon on every street corner. Consequently, Mr. President, feeling that way, and being a firm advocate of the principle of local option, I am glad to support sections 1 and 2 of the resolution as reported from the Judiciary Committee. I do not like section 3 because I do not want to see a concurrent power on this subject reserved in the Congress. Nevertheless, I do like the effort that section makes to prevent the return of the saloon.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] agreed to strike out that grant of concurrent power which appears on page 2, line 7, of his proposed substitute, and when that shall be stricken out I will be glad to vote for the substitute of the Senator from Virginia. If that amendment shall fail, I will then propose the amendment which I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. Is it the Senator's view that striking out the provision in the Glass amendment concerning concurrent power will deprive the Congress of any power to enforce the proposal?

Mr. REED. Excepting in the District of Columbia and in the Territories the Congress will have no power to provide prohibition enforcement in the separate States, further than the power that it now has to regulate interstate commerce. It can prevent shipments into dry States; it can do that at present; it does not need any further grant of constitutional power for that, but I believe that striking out the concluding sentence in the first section of the Glass amendment will deprive the Congress of the concurrent power to conduct prohibition enforcement as it is now doing.

Mr. BULKLEY. To me it is an astonishing proposition that the Constitution should prohibit the saloon and still not have power to enforce its prohibition.

Mr. REED. Not at all. We prohibit a hundred different things in the Constitution. We say, for example, that the States may not coin money; we do not pass any laws about it; the Constitution by itself makes invalid every effort by the States to create their own currency. Now I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. 3. The sale of distilled spirits for consumption at the place of sale shall not be permitted within the United States or any Territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the statement just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] is to me astonishing. He proposes to place in the Constitution an inhibition against the establishment of saloons by the States and to justify that action on the ground that the Federal Government shall have no power whatever to enforce the inhibition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. I did not say that the Federal Government would not have power. Of course the Federal courts would strike down any State law that established saloons.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, Mr. President, if the Federal Government is to take away from the States the power to regulate the liquor traffic, in the event it should be legalized under any amendment that may be submitted, it is surprising to me that the Senator should desire to amend the Constitution so as to prohibit the establishment of saloons and also deny to the Federal Government the power to enforce that prohibition.

I maintain in all sincerity—and I believe the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree with me—that if the Constitution prohibits the establishment of saloons that is an implied grant of power to enforce the prohibition, and, if it is not, such a provision is worth less than nothing and ought not to be incorporated in any proposed amendment.

Mr. President, the debate has proceeded to-day on the theory that the States of this Union have few powers and that what powers they have ought to be subtracted from them. It is an astonishing proposition.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. Of course, my vote on the various amendments and substitutes will be dependent upon the issues involved. I have a great regard, as have the people of Virginia, for the judgment of my colleague, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], but as I understand section 2 as adopted last night, it prohibits the transportation and use of any intoxicating liquors in a State, Territory, or possession of the United States that prohibits such transportation and use by its own laws. Is that true?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is entirely true.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, if the sale of liquor and saloons were to be prohibited by the State of Virginia or the State of Pennsylvania or any other State in the Union, section 2, as adopted, would allow the Federal Government to prevent the transportation and use of intoxicating liquors within that State. Is that true?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. SWANSON. Consequently, it is left entirely to the States to determine in what manner intoxicating liquors shall be sold or used and to what places such liquors may be transported. Is that established definitely under section 2 of the proposed amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that is true.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I can not yield for other Senators to express their opinions in my time.

Mr. SWANSON. I merely asked the Senator if the premises stated by me are correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The language of section 2 is perfectly plain.

The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

That leaves to the States the power of regulation; it places the moral force of the Government of the United States behind the States in the enforcement of their laws; and that is exactly what we on this side of the Chamber are committed to, in so far as we can be committed by a platform declaration. Our platform states that we will—

Effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the States.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. The platform of the Senator's party says that " we urge the enactment " by the several States of such laws as will do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The platform reads:

As will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the States.

That is what I read.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can not yield; the Senator understands that I have only a few minutes left. I should like to use a part of my own time.

The issue here is whether the Federal Government is going to take away from the States all power after repealing the eighteenth amendment, in the event the repeal shall be ratified. The question is whether we will say, "You must find some other way of disposing of liquor in the event your people are authorized to dispose of it."

Now let us look at this question from a practical standpoint.

Everybody condemns the saloon. I am no champion of the saloon, and never have been. I have submerged my personal views, in so far as I am able to do so, and have conformed them to the platform declarations of my party, believing that it is my duty to take that course. But suppose we say there never shall be a saloon, but there shall be the sale of liquor. How is it to be accomplished? Is that an implied declaration in favor of the State's going into the liquor business, in favor of the State's engaging in the sale of liquor? If we deny to the States all power in the determination of any question as to how liquor shall be disposed of, what are we going to see done about it? What is the practical effect of it?

Granting that the saloon is very unpopular, if liquor is to be sold at all it must be sold either in saloons or by State agencies, and I do not think that the Congress ought to be committed to the policy that we are choosing permanently between those agencies.

The States of the Union have some measure of responsibility. They have just as much ability to handle this question as the Congress has, and, from the way we are dealing with it, I am inclined to think just a little more ability than we are displaying. The character of the men who serve the States in public office is comparable in integrity and in capacity to that of those who serve the Federal Government. This is another illustration of the disposition of some in public life to take away all powers from the States; and I am not willing to do that, particularly in view of the declaration I have read.

The statement has been made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] that one who votes for the joint resolution as it has been amended votes for the return of saloons. That declaration is not sustained by the facts. We simply vote, in the event the amendment to the Constitution is ratified, that the States shall possess some power in determining how this liquor problem shall be handled.

I agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] that there is no ideal way of dealing with the liquor problem. We have been looking for such a way for almost a century, and it has not been found. Troubles and difficulties inhere in the problem, and they will not be solved by a declaration in the Constitution of the United States—which, as insisted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, there will be no power to enforce or carry out—that the States shall not deal with this subject in accordance with their best judgment. We say that we are opposed to the saloon, and yet in a time when saloons are unlawful we see them established and maintained in many communities where the law forbids them; and the question arises, or may arise, in the minds of many Senators, as to whether an unlawful speakeasy is a preferable institution to a licensed saloon.

I do not justify the saloon, and I hope that it may never return; and I have grave doubt, in whatever form this amendment is submitted, whether 36 States of the Union will ratify the amendment. I believe, however, that there is sufficient sentiment in the country favoring a change of present conditions, as they relate to the control of the alcoholic-beverage traffic, to justify this Congress in submitting the question to the people of the United States for their decision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, it seems to me that to a great extent we have lost sight here of the real substance of this proposition. One Senator after another has risen on this floor and assumed a fact which does not exist—namely, that if we repeal the eighteenth amendment liquor is going to come back. I should like to ask when it ever went away.

Every man in this Chamber knows that the police records of the Capital of the United States—Washington, D. C.—show that in the 10 years following prohibition, as compared with the 10 years preceding prohibition, five times as many persons under 21 years of age were arrested for intoxication. Therefore, if five times as many persons under 21 years of age have been arrested in the 10 years following prohibition as were arrested in the 10 years preceding it, in the Capital of the United States, right here under the nose of Congress, what is the use of talking about liquor "coming back"?

Every man here knows that he can go to the telephone and have a bootlegger come up to his office and deliver liquor within a half hour. Every man here knows that New York and Chicago and every other large city are filled with speakeasies. We know that crime has grown on a scale never before seen in the history of any country. We know that gunmen have ruled our cities. Yet men have the effrontery, it seems to me, to stand here and say that we are "going back" to this wicked thing called liquor, when under the present condition it has corrupted more public officials and Government officers than ever before, increased drinking among the young, built speakeasies all over the land, and made hijacking and bootlegging and distilling in an illegal way the words of mouth of every citizen in this country.

I say that we never should have taken this question from the States. It is not a national question. It is a local question, and it can be solved best in the communities that have to deal with it. This Government never was conceived with the idea that we would reach out into every community and govern the habits and the morals and the religion of people in those communities. We were to deal with national questions only—the Army and the Navy, interstate and foreign commerce, post offices and post roads, and the rest of the 18 powers given to us by the Constitution. We had no right at all, except by turning our backs upon the philosophy of the Constitution, to go out in the States and assume this power and this control. The sooner we give it back to the States the sooner we shall establish law and order and decency and some respect for government.

When my friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] gets up and tells about the good women of this land who are going to be debauched with liquor he loses sight of the fact that the good women of this land are drinking more under prohibition than they ever drank under the old régime, and every man in this Chamber knows it. The Senator also knows that more youths are drinking to-day than ever drank before in the history of this Republic. He knows that there is more graft and corruption and hypocrisy in both high and low places than ever before happened in this country. He knows that out of 3,000 prohibition agents over 25 per cent of them were discharged for discovered corruption in the first eight years of the existence of so-called prohibition. He knows that there have been more murders in the city of Chicago in a single year than happened throughout Great Britain in 10 years of its history. He knows that a criminal ring has dominated that city. He knows that at this moment there are 5,000 speakeasies in New York City, and he knows that bootlegging and illicit distilling go on from one end of this Republic to the other.

Why do we not tell the truth about this subject and face the facts?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. We have made a dismal failure of the whole fabric of temperance. We have dragged this country down to a degraded point in its morals, in its temperance, in its public behavior, that never existed before in all its annals. Yet we stand here hoping to keep a part of this power which has not helped America toward temperance, in my judgment, but has only destroyed the temperance that we have built up through decades of teaching and example and precept.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield for a question, if it is a brief question.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does not the Senator know that when Chicago had 7,000 legally licensed saloons it had 12,000 "blind pigs"?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not yield further. Does not the Senator from Iowa know that right here in the Capital of the Nation, over which Congress has complete jurisdiction, five times as many persons under 21 years of age were arrested during the 10 years following the adoption of national prohibition as were arrested during the 10 years preceding it?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but that does not count—of course not. The Senator does not want facts. He wants to chase a will-o'-the-wisp, the imaginative prohibition and temperance, instead of the actual thing itself.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator has asked me a question, and I should like to answer it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have only four minutes left, and I refuse to yield.

Mr. President, in my humble judgment, trying to be as fair with all the circumstances as a human being can, I say that I believe that the open saloon was no worse, to say the very least, than the hidden, insidious speakeasy—not a bit in the world—except that we could see the saloon and see its evils; but because we sweep our dirt back of the door, that does not mean that the dirt has been swept out of the chamber.

Prohibition enforcement! Temperance! Morality! Where is it under the ægis of the eighteenth amendment? What are the gains? Where are they—with the young? With the women? Elimination of the saloon and substitution of the speakeasy? The crime, the murder, the graft, the corruption, the hypocrisy of men who occupy the highest legislative positions in the gift of this Republic? Are there any Senators in this Chamber who have violated the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead Act? Are there any Representatives in the other Chamber who have violated the eighteenth amendment? I do not say there are. Senators themselves know the answer to my question; and if this law can not be observed in those places, in God's name, where can it be observed?

Shall we be a bunch of hyprocrites, lashed by the lash of the Anti-Saloon League, in the face of 13 years of dismal failure; or shall we honestly face these facts as they are now presented, and as every one of us knows them?

We have made a failure of this thing. It was doomed to failure from its inception. We ought to be men enough to turn it back to the people of each community, who can settle it better than can we, having in view the conditions in their communities. New York can handle its problems better than the people of Oregon can handle the problems of New York for New Yorkers. Therefore, when we have made the experiment, when we have given it money, governmental support, new courts, new district attorneys, and hordes of agents, and we have failed, in God's name, in the interest of temperance, let us give it back to the States from whence it ought never to have been taken in the first place.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the remarks made by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a few minutes ago show a height of courage seldom seen on the floors of the Houses of Congress. Everyone knows his record. Everyone knows how consistent it has been in this regard. It is very difficult for a public man, it is very difficult for the Congress of the United States to admit that it has ever made a mistake. But we have been trying an experiment for the past few years. Every student of history knew that it would probably fail, because every time in the history of civilized nations a powerful central government has attempted to direct the morals and habits and beliefs of its people, it has failed.

When our Government was organized, when the Constitutional Convention was sitting in Philadelphia, the question was brought up as to whether the Congress of the United States should have the right to pass sumptuary legislation, legislation which would deal with the habits of the people, with what they ate, drank, and wore. But these celebrated fathers of the Constitution were keen students of history. They realized that in every great nation in the world when the central government had attempted to control the habits of its people, to make that wrong which custom made right, they failed; that a law could only be enforced when it was actually the crystallization of public opinion. They believed, and correctly, that sumptuary legislation could only be enforced when it was passed by the States or the communities therein, and, therefore, the Congress was not given that power.

Beginning about 1812, communities in the United States became alarmed at the growth of drunkenness, at the increase of intoxication, and steps were taken to meet that condition by prohibitory laws in various communities. About the middle of the nineteenth century a wave of prohibition resulted in some 18 States adopting prohibitory laws, but it was found that those laws could not be enforced. When communities containing people whose habits led them to enjoy and not to abuse intoxicating beverages wished to have their manners and customs continue as they had under their fathers and grandfathers for countless generations, they would find some means of accomplishing that result. Therefore, after a few years, nearly all the States, I think with the exception of Kansas and Maine, abandoned the position which they had taken theretofore.

Then came another wave of prohibition among the States, and it was tried for a while and abandoned. But in communities which had adopted a "no license" plan by the vote of the people in the community it was difficult, if not impossible, for a socalled blind tiger or speakeasy to exist.

Mr. President, in our country, where so many million people are descended from the inhabitants of European nations where for countless generations wine, beer, and other alcoholic beverages have been on the tables every day of the year, it is impossible by any law to make those people believe that their ancestors did wrong. It is impossible to make the people of Germany believe that beer is poison when they have seen generations of Germans using it as a daily beverage. It is impossible to make the inhabitants or the descendants of people of Spain, of Italy, Greece, or France believe that wine is a poisonous beverage. When it is abused, it is, indeed, harmful.

In adopting the eighteenth amendment, we interfered with the growth of temperance. I know that that statement is directly contraverted by ardent enthusiasts like my friend the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who to-day maintained that a vote in favor of repeal, as we propose to vote to-day, is a vote for the return of the saloon in every State and in every community. That, of course, is a statement not actually founded on what will happen, for there is nothing in what we propose to do that will prevent any State or any community from deciding that it does not want to have alcoholic beverages sold in the community.

Where communities consist of people whose ancestors for generations have believed in the temperate use of wine and beer, it is utterly futile for the Federal Government to insist that it knows better, and to undertake to prevent alcoholic beverages from being sold where they are to be consumed.

In the News of to-day there is an editorial, very brief, which deserves reading for the benefit of the RECORD. It is entitled "The Senate's Opportunity" and reads:

THE SENATE'S OPPORTUNITY

The decision of the voters on November 8 has been put squarely up to the Senate.

The Democratic Senate leadership has met the prohibition issue squarely by rewording the Blaine amendment to make it a straight repeal measure, to be passed upon by the voters of the States through conventions.

The only proviso is a restatement of the Webb-Kenyon law, already on the law books, which would write into the Constitution the right of the dry States to have Federal protection against importation of liquor.

A vote at 3 o'clock has been ordered.

The amendment is the pledge of the victorious party—a party which obtained the largest popular vote in the history of the country, elected a President and Vice President and an unprecedented majority of the Members of Congress.

The amendment is an answer to 13 years of foolish attempt to legislate morality by Federal decree.

The Senate to-day, by passing this amendment, can put an end to this costly and absurd mistake.

We know of nothing that would do more to clear the deck for an intelligent attack upon the desperate economic problem confronting the country.

Mr. President, I know that those in favor of repeal are charged by the ardent advocates of prohibition with many crimes, with being interested in promoting the liquor business, with being interested in promoting the return of the saloon, and so forth, ad libitum, ad nauseam. But a study of the figures in regard to intoxication, referred to in part by the Senator from Maryland in his speech a few moments ago, gives clear evidence of the fact that under prohibition temperance has decreased and not increased. Two years ago, from figures which were before the committee, it was shown that there were more people arrested for intoxication in the United States than in the year before prohibition was adopted. Worse than that, far more young people were arrested. Prohibition was adopted to keep the young people from ever knowing the taste of alcoholic beverages. Yet in the city of Cleveland year before last 30,000 persons were arrested for intoxication. The courts in that city keep a record of the ages of persons arrested for intoxication, and we were told by a judge of one of the courts that the average age of those 30,000 persons was only 25 years. In other words, 15,000 of those persons were under 25 years of age, and when prohibition was adopted were not more than 11 or 12 years of age, although it was to keep young people from ever knowing the taste of intoxicating beverages.

The story is the same all over the country. High-school children who never thought of partaking of alcoholic beverages or spirituous liquors in the days before prohibition now think it is the smart thing to do. There are communities where no high-school society or sorority or other organization can even secure a club or a hotel in which to hold an annual dance because of what goes on.

It is because those of us who have studied this question free from bias, and interested only in promoting temperance, have come to the conclusion——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after listening to the debate to-day, particularly on the subject of the saloon, I have become convinced that there will be no way to prevent the return of the saloon if the eighteenth amendment shall be repealed. I agree with everything the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has said with reference to the saloon, and I am just as much opposed to its return as anyone could possibly be. No power on earth could keep that institution clean, or make it respectable, and I do not want to see it returned. For that reason I am going to vote against the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. President, what is the situation now? We have in the Constitution the eighteenth amendment, which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors, and prohibits their being sold and drunk upon the premises where sold. Gentlemen come to us now and say that we must repeal that amendment because we can not enforce it. Yet they say to us in the next breath, "If you legalize the sale of intoxicating liquors, the National Government can effectively prevent their being drunk on the premises where sold." In other words, we are asked to turn back to the States the power to do everything except control the places where liquor may be consumed. In my opinion, under any possible amendment which can be drawn, that would be a practical impossibility. If we can not prevent liquor being drunk on the premises of 5,000 saloons in New York to-night, when it is illegal to sell it, could we prevent it being drunk upon those premises after it was made legal to sell it?

The only way to fight the American saloon is to fight it as it was fought when we adopted the eighteenth amendment, that is, to outlaw the liquor traffic and make it an outlaw under the laws of the United States. If we have not the courage to enforce the law against sale, shall we have the courage to enforce the infinitely more difficult task of preventing the place of drinking legally sold liquor?

Suppose, as an illustration, there were in the State of New York a system which permitted the sale of nonintoxicating liquors in a saloon, but the Government said that intoxicating liquors should not be sold. Then suppose intoxicating liquors were sold in some saloon. It is proposed to take away the power of the National Government to enter that saloon to see whether or not those in charge were selling intoxicating liquors; to rob the National Government of any power to supervise the selling of intoxicating liquors.

I say that where nonintoxicating liquors are sold—as is now proposed in the beer bill, providing for beer which it is said will be fifteen one-hundreds of 1 per cent of being intoxicating—unless there is a supervising power with full control and authority to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors, intoxicating liquors will be sold. And even if the power were given, it would be impossible to execute it. Let us not mislead or deceive the men and women who are making the fight against the saloon. If we can not give them real and effective protection, we should not give them a false and ineffective protection.

If there is stricken out of this measure the provision for concurrent power, and if there is taken from the National Government any authority or any power to supervise, there will be turned over to the lawless elements of the States the power to do precisely what it is said they are doing now, running saloons in violation of the fundamental laws of the States.

Can we expect the States of the Union which have now repealed all enforcement laws, which have repealed all laws by which to enforce the Constitution, to give us aid in controlling the places where liquor shall be drunk, after we have given authority to sell it and dispose of it? Certainly not. It would be practically an impossible proposition.

Mr. President, I venture to say here upon the floor of the Senate to-day that, just so surely as the eighteenth amendment shall be repealed and the liquor traffic turned back to the States, the saloon as it was known in the old days will return, and that brutal institution, where criminals consort and crime is bred will be running in full blast in less than 60 days after the eighteenth amendment shall have been repealed. Yea, more than that, it will be running within 30 days after the beer bill, which is now upon the calendar for action, shall have been passed.

Governments have tried to deal with the liquor question for a hundred years—yes; for 200 years—yet they have never been able to devise any scheme by which they could control the lawlessness of the liquor traffic. The liquor traffic itself is lawless, and to say that we can control it by permitting liquor to be sold, but providing that it shall not be drunk at this or that particular place, is imposing an impossibility which no governmental agency could execute. Make the sale legal and give the States power and right to set up a system for sale and distribution; make the drinking where sold illegal but give the Government which makes it illegal no power to execute its will or enforce its laws; that is the most consummate legal riddle yet devised by the genius of man.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. What is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to amend the substitute of the Senator from Virginia, on page 2, line 7, by striking out the word "The" and lines 8, 9, and 10, as follows: "The Congress and the several States, Territories, and possessions shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." I understand that the Senator from Virginia is not disposed to resist this suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall object to denying the Federal Government the power to execute the mandate of the Constitution, and that is exactly what the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes. The substitute of the Senator from Virginia, as now submitted, contemplates that there shall exist in the Federal Government the power to carry out the Constitution. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania denies jurisdiction in the Federal Government to execute the provisions of the Constitution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. REED. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (when Mr. COPELAND's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. COPELAND] is necessarily absent because of the death of his father.

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. I do not know how he would vote on the pending question. I therefore withhold my vote. Were I privileged to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Therefore I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN].

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 70, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment to Mr. GLASS's substitute was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I would like to offer an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia. On page 2, line 10, add a new sentence, as follows:

No national taxes shall be laid for collection against any intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes which shall be prohibited as a commodity in interstate commerce by the laws of Congress.

I ask unanimous consent to have one minute to explain my amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the substitute of the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. WATSON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the substitute be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 211 the following:

Senate Joint Resolution 202

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the eighteenth amendment

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Article XVIII of the amendments to this Constitution is hereby repealed. The sale of intoxicating liquors within the United States or any territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for consumption at the place of sale (commonly known as a saloon), and the transportation of intoxicating liquors into any State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States in which the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors are prohibited by law, are hereby prohibited. The Congress and the several States, Territories, and possessions shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WAGNER (when Mr. COPELAND's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is absent because of the death of his father. If he were present and not paired, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], I wish to state that were I at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on official business of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]. If my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] were present and voting, on this question he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN].

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—38

So Mr. GLASS's motion to substitute Senate Joint Resolution 202 for Senate Joint Resolution 211 was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I have heretofore sent to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. The sale of distilled spirits for consumption at the place of sale shall not be permitted within the United States or any territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what is the status of the motion which the Senator from Pennsylvania entered to reconsider the action taken yesterday by which section 3 was stricken out?

Mr. REED. If I may answer the Senator's inquiry, I will say that I entered the motion, but it has not yet been called up. However, if my amendment shall not be adopted, I will then make the motion to reconsider the action whereby the section referred to was stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRATTON (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement respecting my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] and its transfer to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement of my pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). On this amendment I have a pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who has not voted. I do not know how he would vote if present, and, therefore, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and, therefore, withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that if my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] were present, on this question he would vote "yea." He is paired as has already been announced by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 47, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment to come in page 3, line 6, after the word "repealed." I hope that Senators will make reference to the joint resolution at that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, at the end of line 6, after the word "repealed," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

Except that no State shall authorize or permit the retail sale of distilled spirits for private profit, or by any private agency, corporation, or person.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. GORE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the sentiment of the Senate has been sufficiently shown, I think, to make it clear that there would be nothing gained by taking the time to vote on the motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in striking out section 3. Therefore, I will not make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion entered by the Senator from Pennsylvania is withdrawn.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I renew the motion?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Under the unanimous-consent agreement under which the Senate is proceeding, a vote on a motion to reconsider is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unanimous-consent agreement limits the voting to amendments.

If there be no further amendments, the question is, Shall the joint resolution, as amended, be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. BARKLEY and other Senators demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MOSES. May we not have the joint resolution read in the form in which it is now to be finally voted upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that can be done only by unanimous consent. I do not object if the Senator wishes to make the request but the rule provides that the roll call may not be interrupted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the joint resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not object.

Mr. COUZENS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the clerk will continue the calling of the roll.

The Chief Clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. WAGNER (when Mr. COPELAND's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. COPELAND] is absent because of the death of his father. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). On this final vote I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. Were these two Senators present, I understand that they would vote "yea." Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). On this final vote the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and I are paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS]. If the Senator from Montana were present, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea," and if the junior Senator from Idaho were at liberty to vote he would vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). As previously stated, my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is absent on official business of the Senate. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote on this question, he would vote "nay," and I understand that the Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I am informed that if they were at liberty to vote they would vote "yea," and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when Mr. WHEELER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WHEELER] is detained on account of illness. His pair on this question has already been announced.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. My colleague [Mr. SCHALL] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is absent on the business of the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senators from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD and Mr. LONG] are detained on official business.

The roll call resulted—yeas 63, nays 23, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 63, the nays are 23. More than two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is passed.

Senate Joint Resolution 211, as passed, is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from my colleague [Mr. SCHALL] to his secretary relative to his position on this question.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., February 16, 1933.

ORELL LEEN,
112 Senate Office Building:
Am opposed if section 3 is stricken. Pair me accordingly.
Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with the vote taken on the joint resolution proposing to repeal the eighteenth amendment I desire now to make a brief statement, as I did not have the opportunity to get the floor before the vote was taken.

I wanted to make the same appeal made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] at the close of the debate some years ago, when the question of submitting the eighteenth amendment was under consideration. I think the history of the struggle for the adoption and repeal of national prohibition would not be complete without the brief statement of the Senator from Texas being in the RECORD. It seemed to me Senators could well take the position so well expressed by the Senator from Texas, the author of the eighteenth amendment. Practically all Senators can vote for the submission of this amendment for the reasons that were presented when those in favor of national prohibition were asking Congress to allow the people to vote their will.

I am not, of course, by inviting attention to the remarks made by the Senator from Texas, intending in any way any criticism of him; in fact, it is complimentary, for it shows what a proper concept he had of the duty of Senators in voting to submit to the people highly controversial constitutional questions. As both political parties favor submission, so should all Senators. In a speech in the Senate on July 30, 1917, the Senator from Texas said:

> The Members of Congress who will not vote for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the decision of the States, where it belongs, unless he personally believes it should become a part of the Constitution, usurps the function of the States, arrogates to himself and the Federal Government a prerogative that belongs to the States, and violates the very essence of their sovereignty. * * *
> Were I opposed on principle to nation-wide prohibition, I would vote to submit the amendment to the States in order that they might exercise one of their fundamental rights. An issue is thus presented by the nation-wide amendment entirely independent of prohibition.

Mr. SHEPPARD entered the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I note, Mr. President, that the Senator from Texas has come into the Chamber; he was not present when I began my remarks. I will say to him that I have read into the RECORD the statement which he made during the debate some years ago on the question of submitting the eighteenth amendment to the States, and I have done so not at all by way of criticism of him but because I think the statement he then made enunciated a sound principle.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for advising me as to what he is doing, and I recognize that he is acting entirely within his rights. I referred to the statement to which he alluded in my speech on January 16 last, the thirteenth anniversary of prohibition, and said that I did not believe that statement a precedent for action under the present circumstances. I do not believe that prohibition has had a fair trial and I do not think it should be submitted at this time. It would be unfair both to prohibition and to the people to do so.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTION

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5125, to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. On yesterday I introduced Senate Resolution 360, seeking to limit debate on all measures for the remainder of this session, and it went over until to-day. The inquiry is whether the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin would in any way prejudice my rights under the resolution now on the Vice President's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I understand the parliamentary situation of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, it is that it went over under the rule, and it would not, therefore, be handed down in the regular procedure until an adjournment of the Senate had intervened. It would then be handed down at the conclusion of the routine morning business with other resolutions coming over similarly under the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not understand that to be the parliamentary situation. Under that state of affairs it never would be possible to bring up this resolution as long as the Senate recessed from day to day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the practice that has obtained here, the same rule applies to a resolution of this sort that applies to a motion to suspend the rules; and we have been taking up these motions under the recesses of the Senate rather than under adjournments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the parliamentary situation is perfectly clear to me, if I may say so to the Senator from Kentucky. He is at liberty, when it in order to do so, to move to proceed to the consideration of his resolution. It has no preferential status at this time.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has made a motion to proceed to the consideration of the so-called destitution relief bill. That is the pending question. It would not be in order now to move to take up the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, however.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to interfere with the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin; but if a resolution of this sort goes over for a day, I do not understand that that necessarily means a legislative day.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, yes, Mr. President.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has not been so held.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes. That is the object in having legislative days.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I have dealt with that subject probably as often as any person on the floor here; and I assert without qualification that the Senator's resolution would be a resolution coming over from the preceding day, and it would be in order only at the end of the routine morning business.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Chair that there are numerous decisions to the contrary. They may not have been rendered while the Senator from New Hampshire was presiding, but there are numerous decisions to the contrary; and I think a motion of this sort stands on the same footing as a motion to suspend the rules, which goes over for a day under the rule. No longer ago than last week, however, we took up on the following calendar day, without an adjournment, the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to suspend the rules.

I am not making any point of it now. I am not going to press my motion at this time; but I desire a ruling of the Chair as to whether I would be prejudiced in any way by the adoption of the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's resolution would not be prejudiced by adopting the motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a brief statement to the Senators who are present.

If this motion prevails, I shall then be glad to yield for the purpose of temporarily, by unanimous consent, laying aside this measure in order to accommodate the personal situation of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He has a very serious illness in his family. He is responsible for one of the appropriation bills now on the calendar. The Senator desires to leave the city at 6 o'clock. Therefore I wanted to make that statement, and wanted to indicate that I shall cooperate with him in every way to meet the distressing personal situation which confronts him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Manufactures with amendments.

STATE, JUSTICE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of taking up the State, Justice, and so forth, appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the situation with reference to the Senator from Maine. The Senator desires to leave the city at 6 o'clock. That means that he wants to dispose of this appropriation bill by 6 o'clock; does it?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I can take a train that leaves at 7.30, if necessary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it proposed to bring up all the questions with reference to appropriations on enforcement matters?

Mr. HALE. I do not know, Mr. President. There has been a day's talk on that subject, and I do not know whether there will be a debate on these matters or not.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in which particular part of the bill is the Senator from Maine interested?

Mr. HALE. I am in charge of the bill, and would like to get it out of the way, if I can, because I shall have to be away, probably, for several days.

Mr. KING. I understood from the Senator from Wisconsin that there was one branch in which the Senator from Maine was particularly interested.

Mr. HALE. No; I am not interested especially in any part of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, to what provision did the Senator from Idaho refer?

Mr. BORAH. I had understood that there were several provisions of the bill over which there would be controversy.

I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Maine going away, under the circumstances, but if these questions are raised it will be impossible to get the bill through by 6 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to have the Senate go ahead and see how far we can go with the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to going ahead; but it seems to me that, while we all sympathize with the Senator from Maine, and would like to excuse him as soon as possible, it should not be expected that we can complete the consideration of this bill, which covers four important departments of the Government, in such a short time. I do not think we ought to be expected to pass the appropriations for these four departments in two hours. I have no objection to going on with the bill if the Senator from Maine desires that. Some other member of the committee could probably take charge of it after he left. But four departments of the Government are involved in the bill, and really quite a number of Senators, situated as I am, having followed the discussion which has just ended, ought to have a little time, which we could get this evening or to-morrow forenoon, to look up a large number of matters which are involved in these appropriations. I do not want to consent to the request with the understanding that this appropriation bill is to be passed in two hours' time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I think there will be less controversy over the provisions of this particular bill than has occurred over any bill we have had before us for some time. But we can never tell, of course, what the Senate may do.

Mr. NORRIS. Heretofore the appropriation bills for these departments have contained items which should have been considered fully. I have not had time to look into the provisions of this particular bill, and probably will not participate to a great extent in the debate, but I did not want the impression to go abroad that we are to pass an appropriation bill providing the appropriations for four great departments of the Government in two hours' time. We ought to have two days instead of two hours.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who is familiar with the appropriation bills, whether in the bill just called to our attention, including the appropriations for four of the departments, he has discovered points as to which there is likely to be controversy.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that it is likely that there will be fewer provisions in the pending bill controverted than have been found in any of the bills we have heretofore considered. The House cut down the appropriations very considerably; and, as I see it, there are not many controversial questions left in the bill, and I think we could get through with it in a very short time. Of course, we can never tell what the Senate will debate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned I do not want the Senate to take any action on account of personal reasons of my own. I had hoped there would be very little debate on the bill and that it might be possible to get it through to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14363) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of amendments to the bill, committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments which I intend to propose to the bill, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

The clerk will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Title I—Department of State, office of the Secretary of State," on page 2, line 4, after the name "Under Secretary of State," to insert "$10,000," so as to read:

Salaries: For Secretary of State, Under Secretary of State, $10,000; and other personal services in the District of Columbia, including temporary employees, and not to exceed $6,500 for employees engaged on piecework at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of State, $1,683,449.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses, Department of State," on page 3, line 25, after the word "department)," to insert "automobile mail wagons, including storage, repair, and exchange of same," so as to read:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses, including stationery, furniture, fixtures; typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their exchange, not exceeding $10,000; repairs and material for repairs; purchase and exchange of books, maps, and periodicals, domestic and foreign, and when authorized by the Secretary of State for dues for library membership in societies or associations which issue publications to members only or at a price to members lower than to subscribers who are not members, not exceeding $15,880; newspapers not exceeding $1,500; maintenance, repair, and storage of motor-propelled vehicles, to be used only for official purposes (one for the Secretary of State and two for dispatching mail, and one motor cycle for the general use of the department); automobile mail wagons, including storage, repair, and exchange of same; street-car fare not exceeding $150; traveling expenses; refund of fees erroneously charged and paid for the issue of passports to persons who are exempted from the payment of such fee by section 1 of the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921; approved June 4, 1920 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 22, sec. 214a); the examination of estimates of appropriations in the field; and other miscellaneous items not included in the foregoing; $77,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Collecting and editing official papers of Territories of the United States," on page 5, line 5, after the figures "$9,158," to insert a comma and "together with the unexpended balances of the appropriations made available for this purpose in the State Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1933," so as to read:

For the expenses of collecting, editing, copying, and arranging for publication the official papers of the Territories of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding, and contingent and traveling expenses, as provided by the act approved February 28, 1929 (45 Stat., p. 1412), $9,158, together with the unexpended balances of the appropriations made available for this purpose in the State Department appropriation act for the fiscal year 1933.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contributions, quotas, etc." on page 13, line 16, before the word "International" to strike out "and," and in line 17, after the figures "$250," to strike out "in all, $575,431" and insert:

International Prison Commission, quota, $4,043; expenses, $957; in all, $5,000; International Commission on Annual Tables of Constants, $500; International Council of Scientific Unions (International Council of Scientific Unions, $46.32; International Astronomical Union, $781.65; International Union of Chemistry, $675; International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, $3,088; International Union of Mathematics, $38.60; International Scientific Radio Union, $154.40; International Union of Physics, $64; International Geographical Union, $194.80), $5,042.77; International Road Congress, $600; and Convention Relating to Liquor Traffic in Africa, $55; in all, $586,628.77.

So as to read:

For payment of the annual contributions, quotas, and/or expenses, including loss by exchange, in discharge of the obligations of the United States in connection with international commissions, congresses, bureaus, and other objects, as follows: Cape Spartel and Tangier Light, Coast of Morocco, $825; International Bureau of Weights and Measures, $4,342.50; International Bureau for Publication of Customs Tariffs, $1,400; Pan American Union, quota, $167,576.40, printing and binding, $20,000; in all $187,576.40; International Bureau of Permanent Court of Arbitration, $2,000; Bureau of Interparliamentary Union for Promotion of International Arbitration, $7,500; International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, $5,400; Pan American Sanitary Bureau, $30,024.11; International Office of Public Health, $3,015.79; International Radiotelegraphic Convention, $7,527; Government of Panama, $250,000; International Hydrographic Bureau, $5,790; Foreign Hospital at Capetown, $50; International Trade-Mark Registration Bureau, $14,330.20; International Bureau for Protection of Industrial Property, $1,350; Gorgas Memorial Laboratory, $50,000, of which $5,000 shall be immediately available; American International Institute for the Protection of Childhood, $2,000; International Statistical Bureau at The Hague, $2,000; International Map of the World on the Millionth Scale, $50; International Technical Committee of Aerial Legal Experts, $250; International Prison Commission, quota, $4,043; expenses, $957; in all, $5,000; International Commission on Annual Tables of Constants, $500; International Council of Scientific Unions (International Council of Scientific Unions, $46.32; International Astronomical Union, $781.65; International Union of Chemistry, $675; International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, $3,088; International Union of Mathematics, $38.60; International Scientific Radio Union, $154.40; International Union of Physics, $64; International Geographical Union, $194.80), $5,042.77; International Road Congress, $600; and Convention Relating to Liquor Traffic in Africa, $55; in all, $586,628.77.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico," on page 14, line 25, after the figures "$120,000," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the unexpended balance in the appropriation for the International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, American section, contained in the act making appropriations for the Department of State for the fiscal year 1933 is continued available until June 30, 1934.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on a number of occasions I have challenged attention to continual appropriations, or another large appropriation, for the settlement of the international boundary between the United States and Mexico. I want to ask the Senator whether any funds heretofore appropriated have not been expended, and whether or not in this bill there is any additional appropriation for the next fiscal year?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, these appropriations are for the next fiscal year. They are for certain congresses and unions for which estimates came in. The House cut out five which are mentioned. Some of them have been authorized by act of Congress, and one by treaty. The appropriations are simply for our quota, under the agreements, to these congresses and unions. They are appropriations such as we have made in the past right along.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not make myself clear. I am not inquiring concerning the appropriation for the Pan American Union, or for the expenses of that organization.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is referring to the amendment, is he not?

Mr. KING. I am referring to the amendment dealing exclusively with the International Boundary Commission.

Mr. HALE. That comes later on.

Mr. KING. It is on pages 14 and 15.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is referring to the amendment on page 15?

Mr. KING. Beginning at the bottom of page 14, and extending over on page 15.

Mr. HALE. I will say that until last July there were two commissions, the International Boundary Commission and the International Water Commission. At that time the two were combined into one, and the appropriations to take care of that one commission were very materially cut down. When the two were combined there was an unexpended balance of about $158,000 from the appropriations for the International Water Commission, and out of that $158,000, $70,000 were reappropriated for the International Boundary Commission. Then a further appropriation of $70,000 was made for the International Boundary Commission itself, making in all $140,000. About $88,000 were put back into the Treasury from the appropriation for the International Water Commission. But the expense of running the Boundary Commission is now very much less than the expense of running the two commissions separately.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows the bill has just been laid on our desks within the past five minutes, and very few have had a chance to see it.

Mr. HALE. The bill has been before the Senate for over a week.

Mr. KING. I merely state that only within the past five minutes have copies of the bill been laid upon our desks. If it has been before the Senate, the attention of Senators has not been called to it.

Mr. HALE. That may well be, but the bill was reported some time ago.

Mr. KING. I repeat the question, Is there any appropriation in this bill for the International Boundary Commission, other than a reappropriation?

Mr. HALE. There is an appropriation of $120,000, plus the reappropriation of the unexpended balances, amounting now to about $10,000, making a total of $130,000 for the commission, which is $10,000 less than was appropriated for the current year, and very much less than the appropriation in the past for that and the other commission, the International Water Commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I know it would be of no avail to protest against this appropriation, or any part of it, but I do protest, because in my judgment, from the information which has been brought to our attention from time to time, the appropriation of $120,000 would be excessive. Of course, I can not object to reappropriations, although that money ought to have been covered into the Treasury, and should not be added to the Budget for expenditure in the coming year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Waterways treaty, United States and Great Britain: International Joint Commission, United States and Great Britain," on page 17, line 13, after the word "vehicles," to strike out "$58,000" and insert "$77,000," so as to read:

For an additional amount for necessary special or technical investigations in connection with matters which fall within the scope of the jurisdiction of the International Joint Commission, including personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, traveling expenses, procurement of technical and scientific equipment, and the purchase, exchange, hire, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, $77,000, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State, who is authorized to transfer to any department or independent establishment of the Government, with the consent of the head thereof, any part of this amount for direct expenditure by such department or establishment for the purposes of this appropriation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what is the reason for an increase over the House provision?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the increase on page 17 has to do with the Trail smelter fumes investigation in the State of Washington.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I will yield, but I will be very glad to explain the amendment briefly.

Mr. DILL. Very well.

Mr. HALE. The situation in Washington is as follows: There is a very large smelter just across the line from the State of Washington, and the fumes from that smelter come across into the State of Washington, and do a great deal of damage to the property of people who live in that vicinity.

Two years ago the International Joint Commission went into this question and made a decision on it, which was submitted to our State Department and to Canada. There was objection to their decision, which provided for a certain amount of damages, and provided for the elimination of the fumes. Each year these fumes, which are still coming down, cause additional damage. So every year we have had to appropriate a certain amount of money for investigating the cause of the fumes and the damage done thereby.

I took the matter up with the State Department recently, and they tell me they have now decided to go ahead under the decision of the International Joint Commission and make the agreement suggested by that commission between the United States and Canada. It will take several years to take care of this continuing fumes situation.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to say, in addition to what the Senator from Maine has said, that unless this appropriation is continued that we have been having for several years we will have no method of securing the proof that is necessary to present in order to secure the damages to which we feel we are entitled through the International Joint Commission. We are only getting one-half of what we have been previously having for this purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 18, after line 6, to insert:

INTERNATIONAL RADIOTELEGRAPH CONFERENCE, MADRID, SPAIN

The unexpended balance of the appropriation "International Radiotelegraph Conference, Madrid, Spain, 1933," shall be available for any North American radio conference or conferences, growing out of the Madrid conference, to be held in Mexico City or elsewhere, including personal services without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; stenographic reporting and translating services by contract, if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); rent; traveling expenses; purchase of necessary books and documents; official cards; newspapers and periodicals; printing and binding; entertainment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, to be immediately available and to remain available until June 30, 1934.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Prohibition," on page 27, line 4, after the word "liquors," to insert "which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him," so as to make the additional proviso, in part, read:

Provided further, That no funds hereby appropriated shall be used for the purchase of intoxicating liquors which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it would be unpardonable for me to consume any considerable time now. I shall be brief if not interrupted. The provision I shall discuss is, however, of such transcendent importance that I would be justified, nevertheless, in consuming more time than I intend to take.

We have just submitted, so far as this body may, a proposal to the States to repeal the eighteenth amendment. I doubt not, although I can not look into the hearts of men, that some of the votes in favor of the submission of that amendment were motivated by the fact that minions of the Federal Government, in pursuance of what they may have thought was the enforcement of law, have invaded the constitutional rights and immunities of citizens. The House of Representatives incorporated in this bill a provision that no moneys appropriated herein should be used for wire-tapping devices or for the purchase of evidence or to entrap citizens or to induce citizens to commit crime.

Mr. President, I am supposed to have familiarity with the vast resources of the English language, but it would be impossible for me, or for any other Senator, to use more vigorous or more appropriate language in denouncing entrapment and the purchase of evidence than was used by the Supreme Court of the United States in a decision which it rendered on December 19, 1932, in the case of Sorrells, petitioner, against the United States.

The defendant—petitioner before the Supreme Court—was indicted on two counts, one for possessing and one for selling half a gallon of whisky. The substance of the testimony at the trial of the defendant was that the defendant, an ex-service man, who had lived a good life, and who never used liquor, was visited by another man who pretended that he had belonged to the defendant's regiment and appealing to comradeship induced the defendant to procure for him—the stranger—some liquor. Whereupon the defendant, yielding to such blandishment, procured some liquor for the imposter who was thus endeavoring to entrap the defendant. The ex-soldier was tried and convicted. The Supreme Court of the United States set aside that conviction. The court swept away the cobwebs and technicalities and said such a cruel, inhuman, unconstitutional entrapment should not stand.

So, Mr. President, the provisions of this bill inserted by the House, and which have been weakened, I regret to say, by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, denounced wire tapping, denounced the use of funds which would authorize a Government officer to commit a crime or to use any of the Government's funds to induce another person to commit a crime or to purchase evidence.

In the interest of time I ask to include in the RECORD at this juncture a copy of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which, as I said, was rendered December 19, 1932.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The decision is as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 177—October term, 1932

C. V. SORRELLS, PETITIONER, v. THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT

(December 19, 1932)

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant was indicted on two counts: (1) For possession and (2) for selling, on July 13, 1930, one-half gallon of whisky in violation of the national prohibition act. He pleaded not guilty. Upon the trial he relied upon the defense of entrapment. The court refused to sustain the defense, denying a motion to direct a verdict in favor of defendant, and also refusing to submit the issue of entrapment to the jury. The court ruled that "as a matter of law" there was no entrapment. Verdict of guilty followed, motions in arrest and to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence were denied, and defendant was sentenced to imprisonment for 18 months. The Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment (57 F. (2d) 973), and this court granted a writ of certiorari limited to the question whether the evidence was sufficient to go to the jury upon the issue of entrapment.

The Government, while supporting the conclusion of the court below, also urges that the defense, if available, should have been pleaded in bar to further proceedings under the indictment and could not be raised under the plea of not guilty. This question of pleading appropriately awaits the consideration of the nature and grounds of the defense.

The substance of the testimony at the trial as to entrapment was as follows: For the Government, one Martin, a prohibition agent, testified that, having resided for a time in Haywood County, N. C., where he posed as a tourist, he visited defendant's home near Canton, on Sunday, July 13, 1930, accompanied by three residents of the county who knew the defendant well. He was introduced as a resident of Charlotte who was stopping for a time at Clyde. The witness ascertained that defendant was a veteran of the World War and a former member of the Thirtieth Division, American Expeditionary Forces. Witness informed defendant that he was also an ex-service man and a former member of the same division, which was true. Witness asked defendant if he could get the witness some liquor, and defendant stated that he did not have any. Later there was a second request without result. One of those present, one Jones, was also an ex-service man and a former member of the Thirtieth Division, and the conversation turned to the war experiences of the three. After this, witness asked defendant for a third time to get him some liquor, whereupon defendant left his home and after a few minutes came back with a half gallon of liquor for which the witness paid defendant $5. Martin also testified that he was "the first and only person among those present at the time who said anything about securing some liquor," and that his purpose was to prosecute the defendant for procuring and selling it. The Government rested its case on Martin's testimony.

Defendant called as witnesses the three persons who had accompanied the prohibition agent. In substance, they corroborated the latter's story but with some additions. Jones, a railroad employee, testified that he had introduced the agent to the defendant "as a furniture dealer of Charlotte," because the agent had so represented himself; that witness told defendant that the agent was "an old Thirtieth Division man," and the agent thereupon said to defendant that he "would like to get a half gallon of whisky to take back to Charlotte to a friend of his that was in the furniture business with him, and that defendant replied that he "did not fool with whisky"; that the agent and his companions were at defendant's home "for probably an hour or an hour and a half and that during such time the agent asked the defendant three or four or probably five times to get him, the agent, some liquor." Defendant said "he would go and see if he could get a half gallon of liquor," and he returned with it after an absence of "between 20 and 30 minutes." Jones added that at that time he had never heard of defendant being in the liquor business, that he and the defendant were "two old buddies," and that he believed "one former war buddy would get liquor for another."

Another witness, the timekeeper and assistant paymaster of the Champion Fibre Co. at Canton, testified that defendant was an employee of that company and had been "on his job continuously without missing a pay day since March, 1924." Witness identified the time sheet showing this employment. This witness and three others, who were neighbors of the defendant and had known him for many years, testified to his good character.

To rebut this testimony the Government called three witnesses who testified that the defendant had the general reputation of a rum runner. There was no evidence that the defendant had ever possessed or sold any intoxicating liquor prior to the transaction in question.

It is clear that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the act for which defendant was prosecuted was instigated by the prohibition agent; that it was the creature of his purpose; that defendant had no previous disposition to commit it, but was an industrious, law-abiding citizen; and that the agent lured defendant, otherwise innocent, to its commission by repeated and persistent solicitation in which he succeeded by taking advantage of the sentiment aroused by reminiscences of their experiences as companions in arms in the World War. Such a gross abuse of authority given for the purpose of detecting and punishing crime, and not for the making of criminals, deserves the severest condemnation, but the question whether it precludes prosecution or affords a ground of defense; and if so, upon what theory, has given rise to conflicting opinions.

It is well settled that the fact that officers or employees of the Government merely afford opportunities or facilities for the commission of the offense does not defeat the prosecution. Artifice and strategem may be employed to catch those engaged in criminal enterprises. (Grimm v. United States, 156 U. S. 604, 610; Goode v. United States, 159 U. S. 663, 669; Rosen v. United States, 161 U. S. 29, 42; Andrews v. United States, 162 U. S. 420, 423; Price v. United States, 165 U. S. 311, 315; Bates v. United States, 10 Fed. 92, 94, note, p. 97; United States v. Reisenweber, 288 Fed. 520, 526; Aultman v. United States, 289 Fed. 251.[1]) The appropriate object of this permitted activity, frequently essential to the enforcement of the law, is to reveal the criminal design; to expose the illicit traffic, the prohibited publication, the fraudulent use of the mails, the illegal conspiracy, or other offenses, and thus to disclose the would-be violators of the law. A different question is presented when the criminal design originates with the officials of the Government, and they implant in the mind of an innocent person the disposition to commit the alleged offense and induce its commission in order that they may prosecute.

The circuit court of appeals reached the conclusion that the defense of entrapment can be maintained only where, as a result of inducement, the accused is placed in the attitude of having committed a crime which he did not intend to commit or where by reason of the consent implied in the inducement no crime has in fact been committed. (57 F. (2d), p. 974.) As illustrating the first class, reference is made to the case of a sale of liquor to an Indian who was disguised so as to mislead the accused as to his identity. (United States v. Healy, 202 Fed. 349; Voves v. United States, 249 Fed. 191.) In the second class are found cases such as those of larceny or rape, where want of consent is an element of the crime. (Regina v. Fletcher, 8 Cox C. C. 131; Rex v. McDaniel, Fost. 121, 127, 128; Connor v. People, 18 Colo. 373; Williams v. Georgia, 55 Ga. 391; United States v. Whittier, 5 Dill. 35; State v. Adams, 115 N. C. 775.) There may also be physical conditions which are essential to the offense and which do not exist in the case of a trap, as, for example, in the case of a prosecution for burglary, where it appears that by reason of the trap there is no breaking.[2] (Rex. v. Egginton, 2 Leach, C. C. 913; Regina v. Johnson, Car. and Mar. 218; Saunders v. People, 38 Mich. 218; People v. McCord, 76 Mich. 200; Allen v. State, 40 Ala. 334; Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501.) But these decisions applying accepted principles to particular offenses, do not reach, much less determine, the present question. Neither in reasoning nor in effect do they prescribe limits for the doctrine of entrapment.

While this court has not spoken on the precise question (see Casey v. United States, 276 U. S. 413, 419, 423[3]), the weight of authority in the lower Federal courts is decidedly in favor of the view that in such case as the one before us the defense of entrapment is available. The Government concedes that its contention, in supporting the ruling of the circuit court of appeals, is opposed by decisions in all the other circuits except the tenth circuit, and no decision in that circuit suggesting a different view has been brought to our attention. (See Capuano v. United States (C. C. A. 1st, 9 F. (2d) 41, 42; United States v. Lynch (S. D. N. Y., Hough, J.), 256 Fed. 983, 984; Lucadamo v. United States (C. C. A. 2d), 280 Fed. 653, 657, 658; Zucker v. United States (C. C. A. 3d), 288 Fed. 12, 15; Gargano v. United States (C. C. A. 5th), 24 F. (2d) 625, 626; Cermak v. United States (C. C. A. 9th), 223 Fed. 412.) And the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fourth Circuit, in the instant case, was able to reach its conclusion only by declining to follow the rule which it had laid down in its earlier decision in Newman v. United States (299 Fed. 128, 131[4]). It should be added that in many cases in which the evidence has been found insufficient to support the defense of entrapment the availability of that defense on a showing of such facts as are present here, has been recognized.[5]

The Federal courts have generally approved the statement of Circuit Judge Sanborn in the leading case of Butts v. United States, supra, as follows: "The first duties of the officers of the law are to prevent, not to punish crime. It is not their duty to incite to and create crime for the sole purpose of prosecuting and punishing it. Here the evidence strongly tends to prove, if it does not conclusively do so, that their first and chief endeavor was to cause, to create, crime in order to punish it, and it is unconscionable, contrary to public policy, and to the established law of the land to punish a man for the commission of an offense of the like of which he had never been guilty, either in thought or in deed, and evidently never would have been guilty of if the officers of the law had not inspired, incited, persuaded, and lured him to attempt to commit it." The judgment in that case was reversed because of the "fatal error" of the trial court in refusing to instruct the jury to that effect. In Newman v. United States, supra, the applicable principle was thus stated by Circuit Judge Woods: "It is well settled that decoys may be used to entrap criminals, and to present opportunity to one intending or willing to commit crime. But decoys are not permissible to ensnare the innocent and law-abiding into the commission of crime. When the criminal design originates, not with the accused, but is conceived in the mind of the Government officers, and the accused is by persuasion, deceitful representation, or inducement lured into the commission of a criminal act, the Government is estopped by sound public policy from prosecution therefor." These quotations sufficiently indicate the grounds of the decisions above cited.

The validity of the principle as thus stated and applied is challenged both upon theoretical and practical grounds. The argument, from the standpoint of principle, is that the court is called upon to try the accused for a particular offense which is defined by statute and that, if the evidence shows that this offense has knowingly been committed, it matters not that its commission was induced by officers of the Government in the manner and circumstances assumed. It is said that where one intentionally does an act in circumstances known to him, and the particular conduct is forbidden by the law in those circumstances, he intentionally breaks the law in the only sense in which the law considers intent. (Ellis v. United States, 206 U. S. 246, 257.) Moreover, that as the statute is designed to redress a public wrong, and not a private injury, there is no ground for holding the Government estopped by the conduct of its officers from prosecuting the offender. To the suggestion of public policy the objectors answer that the legislature, acting within its constitutional authority, is the arbiter of public policy[6] and that, where conduct is expressly forbidden and penalized by a valid statute, the courts are not at liberty to disregard the law and to bar a prosecution for its violation because they are of the opinion that the crime has been instigated by Government officials.

It is manifest that these arguments rest entirely upon the letter of the statute. They take no account of the fact that its application in the circumstances under consideration is foreign to its purpose; that such an application is so shocking to the sense of justice that it has been urged that it is the duty of the court to stop the prosecution in the interest of the Government itself, to protect it from the illegal conduct of its officers and to preserve the purity of its courts. (Casey v. United States, supra.) But can an application of the statute having such an effect—creating a situation so contrary to the purpose of the law and so inconsistent with its proper enforcement as to invoke such a challenge—fairly be deemed to be within its intendment?

Literal interpretation of statutes at the expense of the reason of the law and producing absurd consequences or flagrant injustice has frequently been condemned. In United States v. Palmer (3 Wheat. 610, 631), Chief Justice Marshall, in construing the act of Congress of April 30, 1790, section 8 (1 Stat. 113), relating to robbery on the high seas, found that the words "any person or persons" were "broad enough to comprehend every human being"; but he concluded that "general words must not only be limited to cases within the jurisdiction of the State but also to those objects to which the legislature intended to apply them." In United States v. Kirby (7 Wall. 482) the case arose under the act of Congress of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 104), providing for the conviction of any person who "shall knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of any driver or carrier * * * carrying the same." Considering the purpose of the statute, the court held that it had no application to the obstruction or retarding of the passage of the mail or of its carrier by reason of the arrest of the carrier upon a warrant issued by a State court. The court said: "All laws should receive a sensible construction. General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice, oppression, or an absurd consequence. It will always, therefore, be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter." And the court supported this conclusion by reference to the classical illustrations found in Puffendorf and Plowden. (Id., pp. 486–487.)

Applying this principle in Lau Ow Bew v. United States (144 U. S. 47), the court decided that a statute requiring the permission of the Chinese Government, and identification by certificate, of "every Chinese person other than a laborer," entitled by treaty or the act of Congress to come within the United States, did not apply to Chinese merchants already domiciled in the United States, who had left the country for temporary purposes, animo revertendi, and sought to reenter it on their return to their business and their homes. And in United States v. Katz (271 U. S. 354, 362), construing section 10 of the national prohibition act so as to avoid an unreasonable application of its words, if taken literally, the court again declared that "general terms descriptive of a class of persons made subject to a criminal statute may and should be limited where the literal application of the statute would lead to extreme or absurd results, and where the legislative purpose gathered from the whole act would be satisfied by a more limited interpretation."[1] See, to the same effect, Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold Company (93 U. S. 634, 638); Carlisle v. United States (16 Wall. 147, 153); Oates v. National Bank (100 U. S. 239); Chew Heong v. United States (112 U. S. 536, 555); Holy Trinity Church v. United States (143 U. S. 457, 459–462); Hawaii v. Mankichi (190 U. S. 197, 212–214); Jacobson v. Massachusetts (197 U. S. 11, 39); United States v. Jin Fuey Moy (241 U. S. 394, 402); Baender v. Barnett (255 U. S. 224, 226); United States v. Chemical Foundation (272 U. S. 1, 18).

We think that this established principle of construction is applicable here. We are unable to conclude that it was the intention of the Congress in enacting this statute that its processes of detection and enforcement should be abused by the instigation by Government officials of an act on the part of persons otherwise innocent in order to lure them to its commission and to punish them. We are not forced by the letter to do violence to the spirit and purpose of the statute. This, we think, has been the underlying and controlling thought in the suggestions in judicial opinions that the Government in such a case is estopped to prosecute or that the courts should bar the prosecution. If the requirements of the highest public policy in the maintenance of the integrity of administration would preclude the enforcement of the statute in such circumstances as are present here, the same considerations justify the conclusion that the case lies outside the purview of the act and that its general words should not be construed to demand a proceeding at once inconsistent with that policy and abhorrent to the sense of justice. This view does not derogate from the authority of the court to deal appropriately with abuses of its process and it obviates the objection to the exercise by the court of a dispensing power in forbidding the prosecution of one who is charged with conduct assumed to fall within the statute.

We are unable to approve the view that the court, although treating the statute as applicable despite the entrapment, and the defendant as guilty, has authority to grant immunity or to adopt a procedure to that end. It is the function of the court to construe the statute, not to defeat it as construed. Clemency is the function of the Executive. (Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 42.) In that case this court decisively denied such authority to free guilty defendants in holding that the court had no power to suspend sentences indefinitely. The court, speaking by Chief Justice White, said: "If it be that the plain legislative command fixing a specific punishment for crime is subject to be permanently set aside by an implied judicial power upon considerations extraneous to the legality of the conviction, it would seem necessarily to follow that there could be likewise implied a discretionary authority to permanently refuse to try a criminal charge because of the conclusion that a particular act made criminal by law ought not to be treated as criminal. And thus it would come to pass that the possession by the judicial department of power to permanently refuse to enforce a law would result in the destruction of the conceded powers of the other departments and hence leave no law to be enforced." And while recognizing the humane considerations which had led judges to adopt the practice of suspending sentences indefinitely in certain cases, the court found no ground for approving the practice, "since its exercise in the very nature of things amounts to a refusal by the judicial power to perform a duty resting upon it and, as a consequence thereof, to an interference with both the legislative and executive authority as fixed by the Constitution." (Id., pp. 51, 52.) Where defendant has been duly indicted for an offense found to be within the statute and the proper authorities seek to proceed with the prosecution, the court can not refuse to try the case in the constitutional method because it desires to let the defendant go free.

Suggested analogies from procedure in civil cases are not helpful. When courts of law refuse to sustain alleged causes of action which grow out of illegal schemes, the applicable law itself denies the right to recover. Where courts of equity refuse equitable relief, because complainants come with unclean hands, they are administering the principles of equitable jurisprudence governing equitable rights. But in a criminal prosecution the statute defining the offense is necessarily the law of the case.

To construe statutes so as to avoid absurd or glaringly unjust results foreign to the legislative purpose is, as we have seen, a traditional and appropriate function of the courts. Judicial nullification of statutes, admittedly valid and applicable, has, happily, no place in our system. The Congress by legislation can always, if it desires, alter the effect of judicial construction of statutes. We conceive it to be our duty to construe the statute here in question reasonably, and we hold that it is beyond our prerogative to give the statute an unreasonable construction, confessedly contrary to public policy, and then to decline to enforce it.

The conclusion we have reached upon these grounds carries its own limitation. We are dealing with a statutory prohibition and we are simply concerned to ascertain whether in the light of a plain public policy and of the proper administration of justice, conduct induced as stated should be deemed to be within that prohibition. We have no occasion to consider hypothetical cases of crimes so heinous or revolting that the applicable law would admit of no exceptions. No such situation is presented here. The question in each case must be determined by the scope of the law considered in the light of what may fairly be deemed to be its object.

Objections to the defense of entrapment are also urged upon practical grounds. But consideration of mere convenience must yield to the essential demands of justice. The argument is pressed that if the defense is available it will lead to the introduction of issues of a collateral character relating to the activities of the officials of the Government and to the conduct and purposes of the defendant previous to the alleged offense. For the defense of entrapment is not simply that the particular act was committed at the instance of Government officials. That is often the case where the proper action of these officials leads to the revelation of criminal enterprises. (Grimm v. United States, supra.) The predisposition and criminal design of the defendant are relevant. But the issues raised and the evidence adduced must be pertinent to the controlling question whether the defendant is a person otherwise innocent whom the Government is seeking to punish for an alleged offense which is the product of the creative activity of its own officials. If that is the fact, common justice requires that the accused be permitted to prove it. The Government in such a case is in no position to object to evidence of the activities of its representatives in relation to the accused, and if the defendant seeks acquittal by reason of entrapment he can not complain of an appropriate and searching inquiry into his own conduct and predisposition as bearing upon that issue. If in consequence he suffers a disadvantage, he has brought it upon himself by reason of the nature of the defense.

What has been said indicates the answer to the contention of the Government that the defense of entrapment must be pleaded in bar to further proceedings under the indictment and can not be raised under the plea of not guilty. This contention presupposes that the defense is available to the accused and relates only to the manner in which it shall be presented. The Government considers the defense as analogous to a plea of pardon or of autrefois convict or autrefois acquit. It is assumed that the accused is not denying his guilt but is setting up special facts in bar upon which he relies regardless of his guilt or innocence of the crime charged. This, as we have seen, is a misconception. The defense is available, not in the view that the accused though guilty may go free but that the Government can not be permitted to contend that he is guilty of a crime where the Government officials are the instigators of his conduct. The Federal courts in sustaining the defense in such circumstances have proceeded in the view that the defendant is not guilty. The practice of requiring a plea in bar has not obtained. Fundamentally the question is whether the defense, if the facts bear it out, takes the case out of the purview of the statute because it can not be supposed that the Congress intended that the letter of its enactment should be used to support such a gross perversion of its purpose.

We are of the opinion that upon the evidence produced in the instant case the defense of entrapment was available and that the trial court was in error in holding that as a matter of law there was no entrapment and in refusing to submit the issue to the jury.

[1] In Hawaii v. Mankichi (190 U. S. 197, 214), the court referred with approval to the following language of the master of the rolls (afterwards Lord Esher) in Plumstead Board of Works v. Spackman (L. R. 13 Q. B. D. 878, 887): "If there are no means of avoiding such an interpretation of the statute" (as will amount to a great hardship), "a judge must come to the conclusion that the legislature by inadvertence has committed an act of legislative injustice; but to my mind a judge ought to struggle with all the intellect that he has, and with all the vigor of mind that he has, against such an interpretation of an act of Parliament; and, unless he is forced to come to a contrary conclusion, he ought to assume that it is impossible that the legislature could have so intended."

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds is of the opinion that the judgment below should be affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES
No. 177—October term, 1932

C. V. SORRELLS, PETITIONER, v. THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT

(December 19, 1932)

Mr. Justice Roberts:

The facts set forth in the court's opinion establish that a prohibition enforcement officer instigated the commission of the crime charged. The courts below held that the showing was insufficient, as matter of law, to sustain the claim of entrapment, and that the jury were properly instructed to ignore that defense in their consideration of the case. A conviction resulted. The Government maintains that the issue of entrapment is not triable under the plea of not guilty, but should be raised by plea in bar or be adjudicated in some manner by the court rather than by the jury; and as the trial court properly decided the question, the record presents no reversible error. I think, however, the judgment should be reversed, but for reasons and upon grounds other than those stated in the opinion of the court.

Of late the term "entrapment" has been adopted by the courts to signify instigation of crime by officers of government. The cases in which such incitement has been recognized as a defense have grown to an amazing total.[1] The increasing frequency of the assertion that the defendant was entrapped is doubtless due to the creation by statute of many new crimes (e. g., sale and transportation of liquor and narcotics) and the correlative establishment of special enforcement bodies for the detection and punishment of offenders. The efforts of members of these forces to obtain arrests and convictions have too often been marked by reprehensible methods.

Society is at war with the criminal classes, and courts have uniformly held that in waging this warfare the forces of prevention and detection may use traps, decoys, and deception to obtain evidence of the commission of crime. Resort to such means does not render an indictment thereafter found a nullity nor call for the exclusion of evidence so procured. (Compare Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438.) But the defense here asserted involves more than obtaining evidence by artifice or deception. Entrapment is the conception and planning of an offense by an officer, and his procurement of its commission by one who would not have perpetrated it except for the trickery, persuasion, or fraud of the officer. Federal and State courts have held that substantial proof of entrapment as thus defined calls for the submission of the issue to the jury and warrants an acquittal. The reasons assigned in support of this procedure have not been uniform. Thus it has been held that the acts of its officers estop the Government to prove the offense. The result has also been justified by the mere statement of the rule that where entrapment is proved the defendant is not guilty of the crime charged. Often the defense has been permitted upon grounds of public policy, which the courts formulate by saying they will not permit their process to be used in aid of a scheme for the actual creation of a crime by those whose duty is to deter its commission.

This court has adverted to the doctrine (Casey v. United States, 276 U. S. 413), but has not heretofore had occasion to determine its validity, the basis on which it should rest, or the procedure to be followed when it is involved. The present case affords the opportunity to settle these matters as respects the administration of the Federal criminal law.

There is common agreement that where a law officer envisages a crime, plans it, and activates its commission by one not theretofore intending its perpetration, for the sole purpose of obtaining a victim through indictment, conviction, and sentence, the consummation of so revolting a plan ought not to be permitted by any self-respecting tribunal. Equally true is this whether the offense is one at common law or merely a creature of statute. Public policy forbids such sacrifice of decency. The enforcement of this policy calls upon the court, in every instance where alleged entrapment of a defendant is brought to its notice, to ascertain the facts, to appraise their effect upon the administration of justice, and to make such order with respect to the further prosecution of the cause as the circumstances require.

This view calls for no distinction between crimes mala in se and statutory offenses of lesser gravity, requires no statutory construction, and attributes no merit to a guilty defendant, but frankly recognizes the true foundation of the doctrine in the public policy which protects the purity of government and its processes. Always the courts refuse their aid in civil cases to the perpetration and consummation of an illegal scheme. Invariably they hold a civil action must be abated if its basis is violation of the decencies of life, disregard of the rules, statutory or common law, which formulate the ethics of men's relations to each other. Neither courts of equity nor those administering legal remedies tolerate the use of their process to consummate a wrong.[4] The doctrine of entrapment in criminal law is the analogue of the same rule applied in civil proceedings. And this is the real basis of the decisions approving the defense of entrapment, though in statement the rule is cloaked under a declaration that the Government is estopped or the defendant has not been proved guilty.

A new method of rationalizing the defense is now asserted. This is to construe the act creating the offense by reading in a condition or proviso that if the offender shall have been entrapped into crime the law shall not apply to him. So, it is said, the true intent of the legislature will be effectuated. This seems a strained and unwarranted construction of the statute, and amounts in fact to judicial amendment. It is not merely broad construction but addition of an element not contained in the legislation. The constituents of the offense are enumerated by the statute. If we assume the defendant to have been a person of upright purposes, law abiding, and not prone to crime—induced against his own will and better judgment to become the instrument of the criminal purpose of another—his action, so induced, none the less falls within the letter of the law and renders him amenable to its penalties. Viewed in its true light entrapment is not a defense to him; his act, coupled with his intent to do the act, brings him within the definition of the law; he has no rights or equities by reason of his entrapment. It can not truly be said that entrapment excuses him or contradicts the obvious fact of his commission of the offense. We can not escape this conclusion by saying that where need arises the statute will be read as containing an implicit condition that it shall not apply in the case of entrapment. The effect of such construction is to add to the words of the statute a proviso which gives to the defendant a double defense under his plea of not guilty, namely, (a) that what he did does not fall within the definition of the statute, and (b) entrapment. This amounts to saying that one who with full intent commits the act defined by law as an offense is nevertheless by virtue of the unspoken and implied mandate of the statute to be adjudged not guilty by reason of someone else's improper conduct. It is merely to adopt a form of words to justify action which ought to be based on the inherent right of the court not to be made the instrument of wrong.

It is said that this case warrants such a construction of the applicable act, but that the question whether a similar construction will be required in the case of other or more serious crimes is not before the court. Thus no guide or rule is announced as to when a statute shall be read as excluding a case of entrapment; and no principle of statutory construction is suggested which would enable us to say that it is excluded by some statutes and not by others.

The doctrine rests, rather, on a fundamental rule of public policy. The protection of its own functions and the preservation of the purity of its own temple belong only to the court. It is the province of the court and of the court alone to protect itself and the Government from such prostitution of the criminal law. The violation of the principles of justice by the entrapment of the unwary into crime should be dealt with by the court no matter by whom or at what stage of the proceedings the facts are brought to its attention.[5] Quite properly it may discharge the prisoner upon a writ of habeas corpus.[6] Equally well may it quash the indictment or entertain and try a plea in bar.[7] But its powers do not end there. Proof of entrapment, at any stage of the case, requires the court to stop the prosecution, direct that the indictment be quashed, and the defendant set at liberty.[8] If in doubt as to the facts it may submit the issue of entrapment to a jury for advice. But whatever may be the finding upon such submission the power and the duty to act remain with the court and not with the jury.

Such action does not grant immunity to a guilty defendant. But to afford him as his right a defense founded not on the statute, but on the court's view of what the legislature is assumed to have meant, is to grant him unwarranted immunity. If the court may construe an act of Congress so as to create a defense for one whose guilt the act pronounces, no reason is apparent why the same statute may not be modified by a similar process of construction as to the penalty prescribed. But it is settled that this may not be done. Ex parte United States (242 U. S. 27). The broad distinction between the refusal to lend the aid of the court's own processes to the consummation of a wrong and the attempt to modify by judicial legislation the mandate of the statute as to the punishment to be imposed after trial and conviction is so obvious as not to need discussion.

Recognition of the defense of entrapment as belonging to the defendant and as raising an issue for decision by the jury called to try him upon plea of the general issue, results in the trial of a false issue wholly outside the true rule which should be applied by the courts. It has been generally held, where the defendant has proved an entrapment, it is permissible for the Government to show in rebuttal that the officer guilty of incitement of the crime had reasonable cause to believe the defendant was a person disposed to commit the offense. This procedure is approved by the opinion of the court. The proof received in rebuttal usually amounts to no more than that the defendant had a bad reputation, or that he had been previously convicted. Is the statute upon which the indictment is based to be further construed as removing the defense of entrapment from such a defendant?

[8] In United States v. Echols (253 Fed. 862), upon the tender of a plea of guilty, the court of its own motion examined the prisoner and the officers concerned in his arrest; and being satisfied that these officers had instigated the crime, declared that public policy required that the plea be refused and the case dismissed. In United States v. Healy (202 Fed. 349), a judgment and sentence were set aside and the defendant discharged upon the court's ascertaining that the conviction was procured by entrapment.

Whatever may be the demerits of the defendant or his previous infractions of law these will not justify the instigation and creation of a new crime as a means to reach him and punish him for his past misdemeanors. He has committed the crime in question, but by supposition only, because of instigation and inducement by a Government officer. To say that such conduct by an official of Government is condoned and rendered innocuous by the fact that the defendant had a bad reputation or had previously transgressed is wholly to disregard the reason for refusing the processes of the court to consummate an abhorrent transaction. It is to discard the basis of the doctrine and in effect to weigh the equities as between the Government and the defendant when there are in truth no equities belonging to the latter, and when the rule of action can not rest on any estimate of the good which may come of the conviction of the offender by foul means. The accepted procedure in effect pivots conviction in such cases not on the commission of the crime charged but on the prior reputation or some former act or acts of the defendant not mentioned in the indictment.

The applicable principle is that courts must be closed to the trial of a crime instigated by the Government's own agents. No other issue, no comparison of equities as between the guilty official and the guilty defendant, has any place in the enforcement of this overruling principle of public policy.

The judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded to the district court with instructions to quash the indictment and discharge the defendant.

Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Stone concur in this opinion.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as to wire tapping I am not unaware of the fact that the Supreme Court some years ago sustained the conviction of a defendant where there was wire tapping, although the laws of the State in which the defendant lived denounced wire tapping. I realize that seldom do lawyers quote dissenting opinions, but lawyers also have frequently found that the reasoning in some instances in the dissenting opinion may be as sound as that of the prevailing opinion. I read what none other than former Associate Justice Holmes said in a dissenting opinion in the wire-tapping case:

It is desirable that criminals should be detected, and to that end that all available evidence should be used. It also is desirable that the Government should not itself foster and pay for other crimes, when they are the means by which the evidence is to be obtained. * * * We have to choose, and for my part I think it a less evil that some criminals should escape than that the Government should play an ignoble part.

For those who agree with me, no distinction can be taken between the Government as prosecutor and the Government as judge. If the existing code does not permit district attorneys to have a hand in such dirty business it does not permit the judge to allow such iniquities to succeed. * * * It is true that a State can not make rules of evidence for courts of the United States, but the State has authority over the conduct in question, and I hardly think that the United States would appear to greater advantage when paying for an odious crime against State law than when inciting to the disregard of its own.

Mr. President, this language is not the "shouting of some demagogue appealing to prejudice." This comes from a former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, than whom for learning, for humanity, for a true understanding of the genius of the American Government, no greater judge was ever on the bench.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ASHURST. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I have not had time to read the bill. May I ask the Senator if there is a provision in the bill which permits wire tapping?

Mr. ASHURST. The House inserted language which would not permit any of the funds herein appropriated to pay for informers or to pay for wire tapping or for purchased evidence. The Senate Committee on Appropriations, on page 27 of the bill, have, in my judgment, appreciably weakened the force and intent of the House provision. I want to make it clear to the Senate that I favor the language of the bill as it passed the House. I prefer infinitely the House provision which denounced the use of Government funds in committing crimes or in purchasing evidence.

I read now from Mr. Justice Brandeis in the same case in which Mr. Justice Holmes spoke, reported in 277 U. S. 436. He said:

The evil incident to invasion of the privacy of the telephone is far greater than that involved in tampering with the mails. Whenever a telephone line is tapped, the privacy of the persons at both ends of the line is invaded and all conversations between them upon any subject, and although proper, confidential, and privileged, may be overheard. Moreover, the tapping of one man's telephone line involves the tapping of the telephone of every other person whom he may call or who may call him. As a means of espionage, writs of assistance and general warrants are but puny instruments of tyranny and oppression when compared with wire tapping.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will the Senator from Arizona be good enough to place in the RECORD the language of the provision as it passed the House and the language of the provision as reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ASHURST. I ask the clerk first to read the text of the provision as the bill passed the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no funds hereby appropriated shall be used for the purchase of intoxicating liquors nor to pay informers nor for the purchase of evidence.

Mr. ASHURST. I now ask the clerk to read it as the Senate Committee on Appropriations reported the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no funds hereby appropriated shall be used for the purchase of intoxicating liquors which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him, nor to pay informers, except that the Director of Prohibition may authorize the payments of rewards for information of major violations of the law.

Mr. ASHURST. Thus it will be observed that the proviso denouncing the purchase of evidence was stricken out by the Senate committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. HALE. The Senator realizes that the exact words of the House text are in the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations so far as wire tapping is concerned. We made certain slight changes as regards the purchase of liquor for evidence.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, but those slight changes are the foxes that gnaw the vines.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Arizona wants to stop altogether the carrying out of the prohibitory law and its enforcement. If we enforce it at all we have to have some money for these purposes.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure the learned Senator from Maine would not impute to me any desire to weaken the enforcement provisions of any law. I am simply inveighing against the unconstitutionality and the inhumanity of the system which takes and uses Government money to entrap men and to purchase evidence. In other words, in my judgment, one of the reasons why some of the votes cast here this afternoon for the repeal resolution were so cast was because of the unconstitutional manner in which the freedom of citizens has been imperiled by Federal minions in some cases.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to say in reply to the question of the Senator from Maine that I doubt if there is any Senator who has more zealously advocated large appropriations for the enforcement of the prohibition law than the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. Simply because I want proper appropriations to enforce the prohibition law does not mean that I want appropriations to violate the law.

Mr. President, each and every part of the Constitution to me stands the same. All of its provisions are of equal force, dignity, and effect. Some persons have been inclined at times to overlook the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution.

In our Constitution there is probably no feature around which clusters more radiant romance or the memorials of which give us more fascinating glimpses of bygone days than the fourth and fifth amendments. In all our jurisprudence there is no other principle that has been more definitely put into position or more joyously accepted by Americans than the principle of the fourth and fifth amendments. They are intimately related; each lends strength to the other and, notwithstanding their apparent nonchalance, they sustain and protect the very essence of constitutional liberty and security. They guarantee repose and the privacies of life.

These noble amendments are as follows:

ARTICLE IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

A gentleman calling upon me once asked, "Did you ever read Lord Coke's famous maxim in Semayne's case?" to wit, "The house of everyone is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defense against injury and violence as for his repose." I said, "I am familiar with Coke, but that was the law of England 1,000 years before my Lord Coke adorned the bench." This is law in every State and was brought to the Colonies when our ancestors migrated hither. I have, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, voted for millions of dollars to enforce prohibition; and as long as the law remains in force, I shall continue to vote for millions of dollars to enforce prohibition; but I shall not wittingly vote for any appropriation which authorizes any agency of the Federal Government to induce citizens to commit crime, cruelly entrap citizens, and I am opposed to the purchase of evidence. I say further that those who love liberty should take for their motto "Principiis obsta"—resist from the first; in other words, do not permit the tyranny of government, do not permit the tyranny of the state, ever to get a start.

It is refreshing, it is like a breath of pure air in a fetid atmosphere, to find that another body of Congress, the body which holds the purse strings and sends to us the appropriation bills, has set its seal of condemnation upon the use of Federal funds to induce men to violate the law, has condemned "wire tapping" and purchase of evidence.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that the words "nor for the purchase of evidence" would comprehend evidence secured by the tapping of wires by employees of the Prohibition Department? I am in entire sympathy with the position of the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. In my judgment, the words "nor for the purchase of evidence" should be restored, because if they be stricken from the bill we, by inference at least, say that such evidence may be purchased.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am not so sure, Mr. President, that the words to which I referred a moment ago and which have just been quoted by the Senator would interdict the course heretofore pursued of tapping wires and using the evidence secured by wire tapping in the prosecution of cases. Personally I should like to see the language of the House bill restored; and, in addition to the words "nor for the purchase of evidence," I should like to see added the words "by the tapping of wires or by wire tapping."

Mr. ASHURST. I was quite content with the language used by the House; but I agree with the Senator's suggestion as to language that would preclude the use of wire tapping. We are asking that the Federal Government itself shall set an example of obedience to law and shall be a model of propriety in law observance.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ASHURST. I gladly yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I should like to say to the Senator that I probably "got my wires crossed" when I said a while ago that he was one of those who did not want to enforce the prohibitory law. I assumed from his opposition to this provision that he might be one of those—and, of course, there are some in the Senate—who do not want much, if any, enforcement of the prohibition law. However, I recall the Senator's record in the past, and I realize that I was entirely wrong.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if I said anything in reply that savored of discourtesy or acidulated speech, I cheerfully withdraw it, because the Senator knows that I have been in favor of the enforcement, not only of the prohibition laws, but of all other laws, and have made amends.

Mr. KING and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield further; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield first to the Senator from Utah, and then I will yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Maine will modify his statement made a moment ago when he said, in substance, that there are Members in the United States Senate who do not want to see the prohibition laws enforced. There are Senators who believe that the eighteenth amendment should be repealed, and that the Volstead Act should be repealed, but I do not think there is a single Senator who, so long as the Volstead Act is in force and the eighteenth amendment is in effect, does not believe that the prohibition law, as all other laws, should be enforced. I think the Senator's statement is an unwarranted indictment of Members of this body.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator is right. I do not think my statement is really an indictment of anyone; it was not intended as such, but I was simply calling attention to the fact that there are Senators who differ from the Senator from Arizona, who are not very anxious for a strenuous enforcement of the prohibitory law. There probably are certain Senators in the United States Senate who are in that category.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield further?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. It depends upon what the Senator means by "strenuous enforcement." I have voted for every appropriation that has been asked for the enforcement of the Volstead Act, though I voted against the passage of the Volstead Act itself. There are many Senators, I think—and I hope that includes the Senator from Maine—who have objected to the methods employed by the Department of Justice and its agents in the enforcement of the Volstead Act, in their murderous attacks upon citizens, in wire-tapping activities, and in the scandalous methods they have pursued in the attempt to enforce the act. There is a good deal of difference between proper enforcement of the law in a legal, just, and righteous way and the improper methods which have so frequently been employed by the prohibition agents in the enforcement of the prohibition laws of our country.

Mr. HALE. I will say that I did not have the Senator in mind, but I knew of certain Senators who wanted to eliminate entirely the appropriation for the enforcement of the prohibitory law, and I think I am justified in saying that they do not want to provide for any very strenuous enforcement of that law.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, my reply to the kind-hearted Senator from Maine is——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator tell me what he would like to do with this particular amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to see the Senate committee amendment rejected and the language of the House text restored. I should prefer to have the language suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but that would probably take some time. He would be uncandid, disingenuous, who here or elsewhere would deny that not only officers enforcing prohibition but those enforcing some other laws have in the past decade in too many instances induced men to commit crimes in order that they, the officers charged with the duty of arresting, might make what they call "a record" in arresting a large number of men. The language of the House bill, to my mind, is a refreshing assurance that the unlawful tyrannies and cowardly inhumanities that have heretofore characterized some law-enforcement officials shall not be further perpetrated and paid for by the use of Government money.

Too frequently have officers of the United States, minions of power, by some strange lycanthropy, transformed themselves into werewolves that gnaw and consume the liberties and the immunities of the American citizen, who is defenseless under the circumstances. Therefore I say that the House language is a refreshing assurance that these inhumanities and unconstitutional breaches of the liberties of the citizens shall not be committed by the use of funds furnished by the Government.

I respectfully ask for the restoration of the House language.

Mr. KING and Mr. HALE addressed the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I understand that the Senator is not opposing the language that has been introduced by the Senate committee, but, in addition to that, he desires to have the words "nor for the purchase of evidence," which were stricken out, restored?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. KING. I think I will support the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee will accept that amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator desire to have the words "nor the purchase of evidence" restored?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection at all to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest that the Senator from Arizona offer an amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I understand, the question is on agreeing to the amendment in lines 5 and 6. I want to disagree to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in lines 4 and 5, inserting the language which the clerk will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 27, line 4, after the word "liquors," it is proposed to insert "which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. Now I want the other amendment disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Also, in line 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "nor for the purchase of evidence" and insert "except that the Director of Prohibition may authorize the payments of rewards for information of major violations of the law."

Mr. ASHURST. I desire that the words "nor for the purchase of evidence" be restored, so that the money appropriated may not be used for the purchase of evidence. I want that amendment rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I insist upon understanding what this amendment does. Does the Senator mean to leave in the words which the committee have added?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. I think we are getting in confusion here. We can divide a question striking out and inserting. The desire is to restore what is stricken out without interfering with what is inserted.

Mr. KING. That is right.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course, I realize that no man may altogether have his own likes or views adopted by the Senate. My purpose would be to disagree to the Senate committee amendments, and therefore that would restore the language of the House.

Mr. HALE. I understood the Senator to say that he would be willing to take the Senate amendments if we put back the words that were stricken out on page 27, line 5.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was my understanding.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not want any language which prohibits the purchase of evidence stricken out. I want the language which denounces and refuses to use Federal moneys for the purchase of evidence to remain in the bill.

Mr. HALE. I stated that I was willing to have those words that are stricken out on lines 5 and 6 left in the bill, together with the rest of the amendment as amended.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall be content with that.

Mr. HALE. There is not any question about that.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in order that we may do what both Senators have requested, we shall have to be permitted to divide this amendment. I ask unanimous consent that we may so proceed to vote, first on the part stricken out, and have it rejected, and then vote on the matter inserted, and have it agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. That is a composition of the matter to which I could agree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment, which is to strike out and insert, may be divided and voted upon separately, contrary to the rules. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the vote will come on the motion to strike out.

The question is on the committee amendment to strike out.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The language proposed to be stricken out by the committee amendment remains in the bill. The vote now comes on the language inserted by the committee, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Except that the Director of Prohibition may authorize the payments of rewards for information of major violations of the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment inserting the language just read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the clerk did not read all of the amendment which we are to vote upon now, namely, the words "which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was rejected previously.

Mr. KING. I understand that the composition—using the word of my friend—which was entered into, contemplated the restoration of all of the amendments containing new language reported by the committee.

Mr. HALE. That is quite right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senate voted on the committee amendment on page 27, lines 4 and 5, and the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, there was a misunderstanding on this side of the Chamber with reference to it; and I ask unanimous consent that we now reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was rejected, and that we consider all of the language inserted in the Senate committee amendment, which will be, commencing in line 4, following the word "liquors," the words "which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him," and in line 6, beginning with the word "except" and continuing through to the period in line 8. Then we will have a full comprehension of just what we are attempting to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote whereby the first committee amendment was rejected? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the vote by which the first committee amendment on page 27 was rejected is reconsidered.

The vote recurs on the adoption of the first committee amendment on page 27.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I want to suggest here that the thing that is behind this is that the director simply wants to use this authority in what he calls the big conspiracy cases. It is not used in any other cases; and it is only when he makes a survey of the situation and finds that this is the only way that the authorities can reach the problem, that they want to use any funds for this purpose. In view of the restoration of the language that was restored in lines 5 and 6, I certainly hope that the committee language will be continued in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand the position of the Senator, then, he favors the purchase of evidence, including wire tapping, and is pleading now for the restoration of the words which permit that?

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no; the wire tapping is prevented down here on the bottom of page 26. It says that no part of this appropriation shall be used for or in connection with wire tapping. That is specifically provided.

Mr. KING. Then I will modify my interrogation. The Senator, then, desires that the Prohibition Unit or the Government may be permitted to purchase evidence?

Mr. DICKINSON. To purchase evidence but not by its investigators.

Mr. FESS. That is already stricken out.

Mr. HALE. The purchase of evidence is simply a reward for evidence that is given. It simply takes effect in major cases, under the Senate amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do not object to rewards being offered. They are proper and usual. I simply ask that the language stricken out on lines 5 and 6, to wit, "nor for the purchase of evidence," shall be restored.

Mr. FESS. That has been restored.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been done. May the Chair say to the Senator from Arizona that the question recurs on the first amendment in lines 4 and 5.

The question is on whether that committee amendment is to be adopted.

The question is on the committee amendment on lines 4 and 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion having been put to strike out, and that motion having been lost, the question now recurs on the motion to insert the language in lines 6, 7, and 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Chair pardon me and the Senate indulge me a moment while I ask the clerk now to read the provision commencing on page 26, line 23, as it will go to conference?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for or in connection with "wire tapping" to procure evidence of violations of the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That no funds hereby appropriated shall be used for the purchase of intoxicating liquors which are consumed by the investigator or anyone with him, nor to pay informers, nor for the purchase of evidence except that the Director of Prohibition may authorize the payments of rewards for information of major violations of the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 12, to strike out:

The Court of Claims is authorized and directed to prescribe a graduated schedule of charges to be made and collected for certified copies of its decisions and findings of fact. The minimum charge to be prescribed for any such copy shall not be less than 25 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Penal and correctional institutions," on page 36, line 22, after the colon, strike out the following proviso: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the procurement and/or installation in any Federal correctional or penal institution of machinery for the manufacture of metal furniture and/or metal office equipment" and in lieu thereof to insert "Provided, That $400,000 of the prison industries working-capital fund shall, on or before June 30, 1933, be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of 'Miscellaneous receipts.'"

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I hope this committee amendment may be rejected.

The House bill contains a proviso against the purchase of certain labor-saving machinery to manufacture metal furniture.

In the first place, it is gravely questionable whether labor-saving machinery ought to be used in the penitentiaries anyway. In the second place, this is the beginning of a new industry of manufacturing metal furniture in the penitentiaries at a time when the metal-furniture business is particularly depressed anyway. There are so few people entering into new business and opening up new offices that the trade is depressed anyway, and it is an undue hardship on this particular industry.

This industry is perhaps more dependent upon labor-saving machinery and has a larger output per man than most other industries, although there is some conflict of testimony about that. The Director of Prisons proposes to buy paint-spraying machinery in connection with the manufacture of metal furniture, which seems to me grossly improper, inasmuch as the main object of the management of the penitentiary should be to provide maximum amounts of hand labor. There is no reason why convicts sentenced to labor should be permitted to work on labor-saving machinery and throw free men out of employment in these bad times.

I hope the chairman of the committee is not going to insist upon this amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator point out the language?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes. The language is on page 36. The committee proposes to strike out the following language which was included in the House bill, commencing at line 22:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the procurement and/or installation in any Federal correctional or penal institution of machinery for the manufacture of metal furniture and/or metal office equipment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a question? Why use the word "metal," and discriminate against the woodworking industries?

Mr. BULKLEY. I have no objection to striking out the word "metal," but the reason why the amendment was written in that form is that a specific plan was testified to by the Director of Prisons to install machinery for the manufacture of metal furniture, and I do not know of any purpose to use machinery for the manufacture of wood furniture.

Mr. BLAINE. But may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if the director's plan to carry out the manufacturing of metal furniture is defeated, he may very well turn to the manufacturing of wood furniture—furniture made out of forest products.

Mr. BULKLEY. I should be very well pleased to see the word "metal" struck out. I am addressing myself to opposing the adoption of the committee amendment, which would strike out the whole proviso; and I undertook to explain to the Senator why I am informed that the word "metal" was put in there. I did not mean to defend it. I should be perfectly willing to see the word struck out.

Mr. BLAINE. If that language is restored, then we might very well have the situation of having machinery installed for the manufacture of furniture from forest products.

Mr. BULKLEY. I take it that the first step would be to vote down the committee amendment; and then, if the Senator cares to offer any amendment to strike out the word "metal," I shall be glad to vote with him.

Mr. BLAINE. I am not always so certain that under those circumstances an amendment would carry. Therefore, I am opposed to making the discrimination, and I would follow any course by which I could effectuate that purpose.

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not know of any way to do it unless we vote down the committee amendment first.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I should like to say a word about this matter. This installation of machinery was to go in the new Federal prison at Lewisburg, Pa. They are to have about 1,200 convicts in that prison, and no preparation has been made in any way for putting any of those convicts to work. The practice in the prisons is to put about 10 per cent of the population of each prison to work; and they try, as far as possible, to put them on work that will not be competitive with outside interests. All of the products of the work of these men have to be sold to the Government. In this particular case the product is to be about $40,000, and that from an industry which produces about $40,000,000, or one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there has been so much conflict in the testimony as to how much is the annual product of that industry that I doubt whether any of those figures are particularly reliable.

Mr. HALE. I have the figures that have been given me by the department.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a number of figures that have been given to me that show a very wide discrepancy one way or the other.

Mr. HALE. That is quite true. The Senator probably has the figures that were given by the witness before the Appropriations Committee, but I found that those figures which he gave had to do with a selected number of 50 plants in the industry and not with the entire industry. They were simply the ones that had reported to the Bureau of the Census.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Director of Prisons made the mistake of referring to metal furniture generally, without discriminating between office furniture and other classes.

Mr. HALE. The reference was to the fact that $40,000,000 worth of such furniture is produced in the United States, some of which would be produced by this particular installation, and that includes furniture and fixtures for offices and stores, $27,919,000, furniture for public buildings, $8,523,000, and lockers, $3,300,000. The three together make up about $40,000,000.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator say that the $40,000,000 relates only to office furniture?

Mr. HALE. It relates to the various kinds of furniture I have read about, which could be made under this installation in the State prisons. The Government uses slightly over a million dollars' worth of this metal furniture, and this $40,000 product represents about 4 per cent of the Government's consumption. It does not seem to me that that is very great.

These prisoners have to be put to work at something. Their moral and physical welfare depends upon it, and the prison authorities have tried their best to find what the prisoners could do which would provide the least competition with outside industry. If they do not do this work, they will either have to increase the employment in some other kind of work, and thus increase already existing competition with outside industry, or they will have to establish some other new business.

Mr. BULKLEY. I submit that this provision is establishing a new outside business. This is a business the prisoners have not been in before, as I understand it.

Mr. HALE. It is.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am not prepared to question the figures given by the chairman of the committee, except to say that there has been a great deal of confusion in quoting figures, and I am not sure whether he is right or not. I can not say definitely that he is wrong.

I have some other observations to make, but for the moment I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I understand that my colleague is asking only the restoration of the House language, and that his objection is not to the part inserted?

Mr. BULKLEY. Oh, no; I did not intend to object to the inserted part.

Mr. FESS. I hope the chairman of the committee will agree to restore the House language. I have gone into this matter, and I know there are very few people who would be employed on this particular work. I read the testimony of the superintendent, who stated that he thought about 120 to 200 people would be employed.

Mr. BULKLEY. Even that is disputed. It is questioned whether this amount of furniture should not be made by a very much smaller number of men than that.

Mr. FESS. That is true. If we look at it from a humanitarian standpoint, the argument is not very strong, because very few would be employed. On the other hand, it is in violation of a principle which we have established, to avoid employing prison labor in competition with paid labor. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the suggestion of my colleague without any further insistence.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio a question for information. In view of the large number of penitentiaries and correctional institutions which this bill provides for, I was wondering what disposition is to be made of those who are incarcerated. Are we to let them remain idle?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not want the Senator to think I am opposing the employment of prison labor for any purpose whatever. The criticism is that the proposal is to start the prisoners into a new business in competition with a business which is peculiarly subject to the effects of the depression, the office-furniture business. Think how many people are opening offices now. The Government furnishes a large proportion of the demand in that particular line of work.

I say, further, that this is a kind of business that requires an exceptionally large amount of labor-saving machinery, and it is stated that this very appropriation is to be spent for labor-saving machinery, the proposal even going so far as to include paint-spraying machinery. They will not even paint the furniture by hand. They talk about providing the maximum amount of labor for their convicts. Let me read from the testimony of the Director of Prisons and see whether he is trying to find the maximum amount of labor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am making no comment upon the particular amendment to which the Senator refers, but, hastily looking into the bill, I find perhaps a dozen or more penitentiaries and correctional institutions mentioned, places for the incarceration of those who have violated the law, many of them young persons, whom we seek to reform, and I was wondering whether we are doing right in incarcerating thousands of young men and young women, and thousands of persons of mature years, and leaving them in idleness, making no effort whatever for their reform.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, to vote down this amendment would not mean voting to keep them in idleness. What I wanted to call attention to was the testimony of Mr. Bates, the Director of the Bureau of Prisons. He says that he is going to buy paint-spraying machinery in connection with the manufacture of this metal furniture, and I quote now from what he says:

> Now, you might think that we could paint by hand, but it costs us so much more for paint that we have been obliged to adopt the spray process of painting and use the machinery that every modern plant and industry uses.

Is that an effort to employ the maximum labor to keep convicts busy? According to the statement of the director, that is directly an effort to compete in the modern style with modern industry. There is no other interpretation of that language possible.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think that in some way the convicts ought to be employed?

Mr. BULKLEY. I have repeatedly said that I think so, and that the objection I am making is to the selection of this furniture industry, which is peculiarly subject to the exigencies of the depression.

Mr. HALE. Can the Senator suggest any activity in which they might engage that would not compete in some way with outside industry?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think the Senator's point is well taken there, that this is a very bad time to introduce any new industry into the prisons, but especially this industry about which we are talking.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not think we ought to double up on their work in other industries in which they are already competing, does he? What we want to do is to diversify as much as possible.

Mr. BULKLEY. Whatever these prisoners have done before they can continue to do for another year. The suggestion is for the establishment of a new industry in the prisons.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I say to the Senator, on the principle that the Federal Government should not employ its prisoners to destroy or injure the business of private manufacturers, that there are provisions in the law limiting the volume and amount of certain products which can be produced. That is true in regard to shoes, so as not to interfere with shoe manufacturers.

May I say, while I am on my feet, that I have received protests similar to those received by the Senator from Ohio, and they seem to me to have merit.

Mr. HALE. I will say this, Mr. President: That this installation of machinery would allow them to put out more than $40,000 worth a year. But that is not what they are asking for.

Mr. BULKLEY. That intensifies my objection. If the appropriation is big enough to allow a still larger output, and we are relying only on a general promise that it will be confined to a certain particular output for this year, it will only make the objection so much the stronger for the future.

Mr. HALE. The answer to that is that they do not want to use more than 10 per cent of the convicts for this purpose. That is the policy all over the country.

Mr. BULKLEY. It is rather a small output with the use of machinery, if that is what they get out of it.

I am ready for a vote, and I hope the committee amendment will be rejected.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, it is my profound conviction that the Senate committee acted with wisdom when it adopted this amendment. A similar question was before the Senate a year ago and was decided in favor of a provision permitting labor of a not substantially competitive sort among prison inmates. As the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just suggested, the vote in the Senate on that question, after consideration, was virtually unanimous.

In support of what I am endeavoring to say, I ask the attention of Senators for a moment to a letter which I have received from the National Society of Penal Information and the Welfare League Association, both founded by Thomas Mott Osborne, combined in the Osborne Association. The letter is from Mr. William B. Cox, executive secretary.

Writing on February 10, 1933, Mr. Cox said:

> THE OSBORNE ASSOCIATION,
> New York, N. Y., February 10, 1933.
> Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
> MY DEAR SENATOR COSTIGAN: May I take this opportunity of urging you to protest against the action taken by the House of Representatives in so restricting the appropriation for prison industries, Department of Justice (H. R. 14363, p. 34, line 9, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 28, 1933, p. 2768), that it will be impossible to provide any means for employing the inmates of the new Federal prison in Pennsylvania.
> The years 1929 and 1930 were marked by an unparalleled number of prison outbreaks. Although these outbreaks were disastrous in themselves, they serve to call attention to the futility of administering prisons on a purely custodial and punitive level. Since these outbreaks there has been a changed attitude on the part of most prison administrators, who have become aware of the necessity for adopting rehabilitative measures.
>
> These new and constructive administrative practices are now faced with a serious threat. At the very time that those responsible for the conduct of penal institutions have become convinced of the practical value of constructive rehabilitative measures, legislators and the public at large are showing a strong tendency to revert to a purely custodial level.
> While it is unquestionably true that the times demand governmental retrenchment, it would be most unfortunate if the ground recently gained is lost because of a failure to recognize that purely custodial care is the most expensive service which can be bestowed upon our wards. Prison labor has been particularly affected by this tendency. The end result of cutting appropriations for prison industries in order to decrease the competition of prison labor with free labor, is likely to result in a situation of far-reaching serious consequences. Depriving prisoners of an opportunity to work not only adds greatly to the cost of maintaining penal institutions but it also destroys one of the most effective agencies of rehabilitation. By creating idleness in our prisons, we increase the likelihood of riots or other disturbances with their attendant destruction of property and loss of life. In the long run such a policy is penny wise and pound foolish.
> I am thoroughly familiar with the occupational program of the Department of Justice as well as that of most of the States. The Federal prison labor policy is a very conservative one, giving every consideration to the rights of free labor and private industry, as is evidenced by the fact that it has been indorsed by the American Federation of Labor and organized industry. It would be a calamity to change the fundamental principles of this program by yielding to the wishes of a single group of manufacturers.
> Faithfully yours,
> WM. B. COX, Executive Secretary.

Mr. President, the letter is sufficiently convincing for reasons of compelling public importance, and I trust that the amendment of the Senate committee will be sustained.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I hope that Senators will not be misled into thinking there is any great national issue or any pending national calamity involved in voting down this amendment. It is a relatively small amendment, but in principle it is important, because it affects an industry that is peculiarly distressed, and this particular year is a bad time to start labor-saving machinery in penal institutions. There is involved no question whatever of the employment of convicts generally. It simply averts a particular kind of competition for the one year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 36, line 22, the committee proposes to strike out the proviso down to and including the word "equipment," in line 1, on page 37, as follows:

> Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the procurement and/or installation in any Federal correctional or penal institution of machinery for the manufacture of metal furniture and/or metal office equipment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a responsibility which may not be ignored rests upon both the Federal and State Governments to adopt and carry into execution humane and just policies in dealing with delinquents. Too little attention was given for centuries to the subject, penology; indeed, until very recently the question of prison reform was given but scant attention. For centuries persons convicted of offenses were treated in the most cruel and inhuman manner. We read with amazement, if not with horror, the reports which have come to us concerning the treatment of prisoners in European countries as well as in our own land. Prisons were in too many cases dark dungeons which bred disease and hastened the death of those imprisoned. The idea seemed to prevail that a person branded as a felon was to be regarded as permanently incorrigible; indeed, as a leper for whom there was no future. But in recent years courageous men and women have given serious study to the question of prison reform and to the policies which should be adopted in dealing with persons convicted of offenses.

There has come a change in the views of the people as to the method to be employed in dealing with persons who violate the law. Cruel and inhuman punishment has been found does not meet the situation. It has been discovered that it seldom reforms the person punished, and too often sends him forth from behind prison walls with anger in his heart and enmity toward government and individuals. With a study of psychology, of the causes of behavior, of the complex social, economic, and industrial conditions, there has developed the conviction that past methods of dealing with violators of law have failed in part, at least, in their purpose. During the past few years there has been a great increase in law infractions among young boys and girls. Juvenile delinquency has greatly increased.

In view of this situation it is apparent that there is a heavy responsibility resting upon governments, and those charged with law enforcement and with caring for delinquents. More and more it is becoming apparent that our penal institutions must be conducted with a view to reformation of character.

While there must be punishment for offenses, there must be wisdom and mercy and sanity, not only in the administration of criminal laws but in dealing with offenders after they have been brought within the cognizance of the laws. Our penal institutions must be constructed and operated having in view the reformation of those charged with law violation. They must be corrective and reformatory. Regard must be had for the age of the offender and the causes which led to the commission of the offense. Persons of immature years must not be placed in the same category with old offenders or those who have been repeated violators of law. Our penal institutions should have in view, as I have indicated, the rehabilitation of the moral qualities and character of those charged with crime. In some of the modern penal institutions it has been demonstrated that permanent reforms in the lives and characters of individuals have been effected. It has been shown that perhaps a majority of those convicted of offenses were not criminals at heart. In many cases the offenses were accidental or the result of temporary emotional outbreaks. They did not come from a malignant heart or from a disposition or desire to violate the law or injure society. In my opinion, some persons who have been imprisoned for law violations should have been treated for mental disorders and placed in institutions devoted to such purposes.

Mr. President, it has become a serious question, in view of the large number of persons who are now confined in prisons and correctional institutions, as to what disposition should be made of them during the period of their confinement. It has been proven that to treat them harshly or to keep them in solitary confinement or to give them no duties or employment whatever produces most unsatisfactory results. Idleness in confinement perhaps more seriously injures character than when freedom is enjoyed. Our penal institutions must, if reforms are to be effected, adopt policies that will not only permit but bring about character building and moral reformation. In my opinion, the overwhelming majority of those who are sent to our penal institutions would, if wise and humane methods were adopted in dealing with offenders, emerge from their confinement imbued with the desire to engage in useful and honorable employment and assume a proper place in the social organization.

I appreciate the fact that laws have been enacted which prevent contract labor from entering into competition with free labor. I am not criticizing those enactments. I do insist, however, that in the penal and correctional institutions which are being erected and which the Federal and State Governments now operate, there must be plans devised and carried into execution which will save the characters of those confined and afford them full opportunity of casting off improper desires or habits and equipping them, when they shall be free from confinement, to occupy useful positions in the economic and industrial life of the people.

I am not offering these observations as relevant to the question raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], although in view of the nature of the institution which the Federal Government has established in Pennsylvania it would seem that some provision should be made to furnish employment to those confined therein.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is highly important that we find work for those who are confined in our penal institutions, but it seems to me more humane to find work for our own unemployed or to keep at work those who are now employed. To spend $40,000 for installing machinery to give work to from 150 to 200 of the 1,200 incarcerated in Lewisburg, and drive out practically a like number of workers from a competitive industry, is to my mind wrong.

Mr. President, how would you like to be employed, working part time, and have your employer say to you, in the morning, "Your service will be no longer needed because the Government is giving your work to those who are in prison," and further to find out that our penal institutions are going to be mechanized to continue to compete with private business?

As I understand the plan of the Department of Justice it is that the steel-file industry has no competition and that the Government therefore is justified in becoming a competitor. The manufacture of metal files here in this country is a new industry. The Government of the United States for 100 years has been more or less jealous of the rights of a new industry. We have protected new industries by tariff rates from competition abroad. Now is the time in this day, with nearly 12,000,000 men and women walking the streets out of employment, to deny this appropriation and thus protect this young industry from prison labor.

Mr. President, I have high regard for Mr. Bates, who is one of the world's foremost penologists. However, in these days, when millions are unemployed, I am not in accord with him when he wants to close down a part of private business and add to the millions of unemployed. Putting the free man out of work would probably mean the loss of his home, if he has one, or necessitate his seeking public relief for himself and family, while those who are incarcerated at Lewisburg are receiving three meals a day and a bed from the richest government in the world.

I am in favor of the language in the bill as it passed the House, and I hope the Senate will vote down the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I feel like apologizing to the Presiding Officer and to Members of the Senate for detaining them longer on this item, but I think there ought to be some emphasis placed upon the suggestion made by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. Therefore, I am going to utilize my right to occupy a little time.

The whole course of legislation on this subject for the last 10 years has been to relieve free labor or paid labor from competitition with prison labor. Last year a climax was reached, after years of consideration, where we regulated through the interstate commerce power the sale of goods that are made by prison labor in competition with free labor. When it came to the vote it was pretty nearly unanimous. As Senators will recall, we even denied the right of the State to employ its own prison labor in public-road building where it was a Federal-aid road. I doubted the wisdom of that provision. I thought a State ought to be permitted to employ its prison labor out in the open air where the work was road building. But the conviction here was so strong that we ought not to put those two forces in competition that we went even to that extent.

In my own State we responded to the efforts to employ prison labor; in fact, we have a State farm where a certain grade of prisoners are kept out on the farm in the open air to do several things that do not come in competition with free or paid labor in the open market. But here is a case where a new industry is involved. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] suggests that the new reformatory at Lewisburg is one of the finest that can be found, and that is true. Because it is a fine place, we propose apparently to introduce new prison labor, new employment in competition with free or paid labor. I am just as responsive to the humanitarian call of employing labor in prison as anyone in this Chamber, but I do not want to do that at the cost of humanity outside of the prison that ought to be employed. It seems to me, in the light of what we have done in the past, that we ought not to take advanage of this new movement to begin the manufacture of an article of furniture, whether it be of wood or metal, when it does come in competition with the products of free labor or labor that is employed in the various States. It seems to me that the chairman of the committee ought to agree to restore the House language in this particular item.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Mr. Bates has taken into consideration the conditions existing in the country to-day. Congress authorized the making of shoes for governmental requirements; and this item means that only 4 per cent of the shoes required by the Government will be produced by this institution.

In the case of metal furniture it is proposed to manufacture just about 4 per cent of the million dollars' worth required by the Government.

It seems to me that Congress never ought to have passed the legislation authorizing these activities at these institutions unless they intended that the machinery, which is there already, should be used, or additional machinery should not be procured. The committee took that position, and I think the committee is perfectly right about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are two amendments. The Secretary will state the first amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 36, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the proviso down to and including the word "equipment" in line 1, on page 37, as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the procurement and/or installation in any Federal correctional or penal institution of machinery for the manufacture of metal furniture and/or metal office equipment.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to offer an amendment, but I do not think it would be appropriate to that particular amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. DICKINSON asked for a division.

On a division, the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the second amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 37, line 1, at the end of the paragraph, the committee proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That $400,000 of the prison industries working capital fund shall, on or before June 30, 1933, be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of "Miscellaneous receipts."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. At the end of the amendment just stated I move to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That no part of the prison industries working capital fund during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, shall be used for the purchase of yarn from private industry for the manufacture of cotton duck.

Mr. President, I want to explain just what the amendment means. In the Atlanta Penitentiary, as a part of the program to provide employment for the prisoners, there has been established a duck mill. Duck manufacture is peculiar in that the machinery used in the making of wide duck is not adaptable for the manufacture of other textiles. Consequently the competition of the wide-duck mill at the Atlanta Penitentiary is most disastrous. Moreover, a negligible man power is used in the manufacture of wide duck.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator read the amendment again.

Mr. GEORGE. I was proceeding to explain why I offered the amendment. It reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of the prison industries working capital fund during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, shall be used for the purchase of yarn from private industry for the manufacture of cotton duck.

The words "Atlanta Penitentiary" may be added if desired.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the amendment would prohibit the purchase from private concerns of certain kinds of yarn made into duck?

Mr. GEORGE. It would prohibit the duck mill in the Atlanta Penitentiary from buying yarns from the outside and converting them into duck at that mill.

Let me explain. In the Atlanta Penitentiary they have spindles to make yarn; but they do not confine themselves to manufacturing the yarn they thus produce; they have extended their operations, and go on the outside and buy yarn, bring it into the penitentiary, and manufacture it into duck. So that wide duck made by the Atlanta Penitentiary has perhaps reached from 21 to 25 per cent of the Government's entire production of wide duck. It is a fearful competition, and the business is so limited and restricted that the competition is disastrous to the private duck manufacturers.

In the penitentiary they have the machinery for making yarn; every bit of the yarn they make there may be used for wide duck; we are not complaining about that, and my amendment does not restrict them in that respect; but it does provide that during the next fiscal year they shall not buy yarn on the outside and convert it into duck. They can, however, convert into duck all the yarn they may manufacture.

Mr. SMOOT. How will they keep their looms going if they can not make a sufficient quantity of yarn themselves and can not go outside and buy yarn?

Mr. GEORGE. Let me tell the Senator that they can manufacture in the penitentiary one-fifth of all the yarns that they use on their own looms. They buy about four-fifths, but the yarns bought are not by any means all used in the manufacture of wide duck; they are used for all the other products manufactured in the mill at the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. SMOOT. The yarn purchased on the outside has been used in the past in making duck, has it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Not exclusively by any means.

Mr. SMOOT. Not exclusively; but they use in the prison industries more yarn than they can make; and by whatever amount they are prevented from securing on the outside, their activities will be curtailed to that extent.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator does not quite understand me. They make one-fifth of the yarn which they now use in the penitentiary.

Mr. SMOOT. They make that much themselves and purchase additional quantities on the outside.

Mr. GEORGE. They make a great many other things, and the amendment does not provide any restriction on the purchase of yarn for the manufacture of anything else they may want to manufacture in that mill; but it is not fair to bring the sharp competition against the manufacturers of wide duck for the reason that the actual investment per man, so I am advised, of the private mills engaged in the manufacture of wide duck runs from $4,000 to $5,000. The machinery used for wide duck can not be converted and used for the manufacture of other textiles, and therefore the competition is peculiarly sharp and peculiarly unfair.

The amendment will not prevent the use of all the machinery in the Atlanta mill which it may be desired to use, but they must not buy any yarn on the outside for the manufacture of duck. In other words, the duck they make in the Atlanta mill must be made of yarn which they, themselves, produce; but they may buy yarns on the outside and use them for the manufacture of other materials in the penitentiary mill.

Mr. SMOOT. Evidently they have not made sufficient yarn in the mill to manufacture wide duck.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not quite sure of that.

Mr. SMOOT. If they have, I do not see any necessity of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true; I want to say to the Senator that if the amendment shall be accepted, and go to conference, I want it to work this one purpose, namely, that the Atlanta penitentiary mill shall not manufacture wide duck in excess of the yarn they themselves produce.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that, and that is exactly what I say, that in the past I think the mill has been buying yarn on the outside to be manufactured into duck and the looms which they have can not be kept running merely with the yarn produced in the penitentiary itself.

Mr. GEORGE. They may buy all the yarn they please with which to make any other material in the mill.

Mr. SMOOT. But not wide duck.

Mr. GEORGE. Not wide duck. It does seem entirely fair, just, and reasonable that the wide duck manufacture in the mill at the penitentiary be restricted to the yarn output of the mill itself because of some of the facts which I have brought to the attention of the Senate. In 1932, according to the report submitted to Mr. Staub, secretary of the Cotton Duck Association, by Mr. Bennett, Assistant Director of the Bureau of Prisons of the Department of Justice, the production of the cotton-duck mill in the Atlanta Penitentiary was 3,947,513 pounds.

But it is to be noted that this total poundage includes light and heavyweight canvas duck, both in the numbered and ounce goods. It also includes other products such as nainsook, sheeting, and drills, also ticking and light prison-uniform material. In other words, the wide duck is by no means the entire production of the Atlanta mill and the restriction is against the purchase of yarn on the outside to be made into this one product.

Mr. SMOOT. It might, of course, prevent them from buying any yarn on the outside and using it in manufacture, but if the Senator from Maine wishes to accept the amendment I shall not object.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator from Utah is wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. It can not be otherwise.

Mr. GEORGE. It can be otherwise. I have stated to the Senate that if the amendment is accepted I am perfectly willing that the conferees may so arrange it as to prevent the expansion of the manufacture of wide duck in the Atlanta penitentiary; in other words, to limit it to its present production—and I think that is entirely fair. Otherwise, they probably may simply absorb the entire wide duck market.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the situation, and if the Senator having the bill in charge desires to let the amendment go to conference, I shall offer no objection at all.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am entirely willing to let the amendment go to conference and be considered by the conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in reference to lines 22 to 25 on page 36, and a portion of line 1 on page 37.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will be entered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 19, to insert:

Regulation of interstate transportation of black bass: To enable the Secretary of Commerce to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to regulate interstate transportation of black bass, and for other purposes,' approved May 20, 1926" (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 16, secs. 851–856), approved July 2, 1930 (46 Stat. pp. 845–847), $13,950, of which not to exceed $1,800 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator whether all of the amendments on the intervening pages have been disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are no amendments on those pages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the next amendment.

Mr. KING. I should like to make an inquiry as to the reason for this appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Unfortunately, the Congress has authorized the expenditure; and, in the usual way, the persons concerned have appeared before the Appropriations Committee and made a demand that the committee carry out the direction of the Congress.

Mr KING. Does the Senator mean that if Congress has made an improvident recommendation in the form of a statute, we are bound to make an appropriation?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the usual course. Whenever the Congress passes a bill and authorizes an appropriation, we are expected to carry it out in the Appropriations Committee. That is why I have fought these authorization bills to the extent that I have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the next subdivision deals with the Patent Office. I appreciate that any efforts to reduce the inordinately high appropriations carried for that organization will at this late hour and with the haste which is demanded in the consideration of this bill not be possible. I feel certain, however, that if proper consideration were given to this provision of the bill, and all relevant facts presented, the appropriation would be materially reduced. I have no doubt that if the Patent Office were properly operated and a satisfactory and efficient administration prevailed, the appropriation provided in this subdivision could be reduced at least 50 per cent. The bill carries $3,176,250 for salaries and some incidental expenses of the Patent Office. There is a further item of $30,000 for the purchase of books, $250,000 for the production of copies of weekly issue of drawings, and so forth, and other appropriations aggregating $900,000 for printing the weekly issue of patents.

Mr. President, for many years prior to 1922 the fees received by the Patent Office from the public exceeded the expenses of the bureau. My recollection is, that during the period of more than 50 years prior to 1932, this excess or surplus was more than $8,000,000. I should add, however, that during the fiscal year 1918 when the World War was in progress, there was a deficit of less than $80,000. However, since 1922 the Patent Office has expended more money than the fees or receipts paid to it. During this period, the Government fees charged incident to the filing and issuance of patents, have been increased. Perhaps this increase was necessary to meet the growth and increased expenditures of the Patent Office. There should, however, be no deficit. The Patent Office, if economically and efficiently administered, should have been self-sustaining, if it did not yield a surplus to be covered into the Treasury. The aggregate deficit, however, since 1922 has been several million dollars. I do not have the figures before me, as I did not know this bill was to be before the Senate to-day. It is evident that these deficits are continuing, as is shown by the appropriation of several million dollars provided in the bill before us, to meet the operating expenses of the Patent Office during the next fiscal year.

Many complaints have come to me, Mr. President, concerning the delays in the Patent Office concerning applications for patents, and in dealing with preliminary and intermediate questions involved in patent proceedings. I recall that in 1929 the Commissioner of Patents reported that applications awaiting action amounted to more than 103,000. It was claimed that the Patent Office was clogged in part due to unsatisfactory methods and procedure. My recollection is that in the fiscal year 1929 there were approximately 87,000 applications for patent filed and 43,600 patents issued. In 1930, as I recall, the applications awaiting examination were over 118,000, or approximately 7,000 more than in 1929. I have examined graphs which indicate the mounting costs in the Patent Office, the condition of work in the office, the applications filed during various years, the applications considered for each examiner per year, the applications awaiting action covering a number of years, figures showing surpluses and deficits for a number of years, and which also present data bearing upon the activities of the Patent Office.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the next administration will deal with this agency of the Government, and that it will result in reforms imperatively needed. I hope that the next President of the United States, under the authority which I hope will be given him, will make important changes in some branches of the personnel and material modifications in the working and procedure of the Patent Office. In my opinion, Mr. President, Congress has neglected to effectively, not to say drastically, deal with this organization during the past 10 or 12 years. But I believe the day is near at hand when the work of reorganization will be undertaken and consummated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 98, line 13, to change the total appropriation for the Bureau of Mines from $1,464,300 to $1,514,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Children's Bureau," on page 104, line 25 after the word "expenses," to strike out "$344,000" and insert "$308,550," and on page 105, line 1, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$285,450" and insert "$250,000," so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For expenses of investigating and reporting upon matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life, and especially to investigate the questions of infant mortality; personal services, including experts and temporary assistants; traveling expenses, including expenses of attendance at meetings for the promotion of child welfare when incurred on the written authority of the Secretary of Labor; purchase of reports and material for the publications of the Children's Bureau and for reprints from State, city, and private publications for distribution when said reprints can be procured more cheaply than they can be printed by the Government, and other necessary expenses; $308,550, of which amount not to exceed $250,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to urge that the House figures be retained in preference to the figures which have been proposed by the Senate committee. I therefore ask that the Senate committee amendment be rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not urge that, for this reason: The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is not in the Chamber to-night. He is interested in that matter. I do not want to call for a quorum; but if the Senator insists upon the retention of the House figures—which, of course, he has a perfect right to do, and I have no criticism of his action—I shall feel constrained to call for a quorum.

Mr. NYE. I know of many Senators who are interested in the proposal I am making who are not here to-night. I am sorry they are not, but I am going to be compelled——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wonder if the Senator would not be willing to let the amendment go to conference as it is. I believe, looking at it as I see it, that that probably would be the best way to handle the matter.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, if I would be free to assume that those who are offering this suggestion are not overly insistent on the Senate committee amendment, I should feel constrained to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it would not be a free conference if anybody made a promise about it ahead of time, and I know that no member of the conference committee would under any circumstances do a thing like that; but, looking at the matter as I see it, I think it would be a wiser course to let the amendment go to conference.

Mr. NYE. Very well, Mr. President. I shall withdraw my proposal, then, and let the matter go to conference; but I hope it will not go with the RECORD indicating that the Senate is insistent upon the amendment which the committee has proposed.

Mr. KING. I hope it will not go with any implied promise that the Senate conferees are not going to insist upon the committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I assure the Senators that there will be no implied promise about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I should like to have my amendment stated. It is at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 88, line 16, strike out "$614,000" and insert "$741,000."

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out the figures submitted, as well as the House figures, and insert in lieu thereof "$550,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be rejected also.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am satisfied that Senators are not familiar with this particular appropriation.

Mr. President, the appropriations for safety work in the Bureau of Mines have undergone extensive reductions—so extensive, in fact, as to lay the Congress open to the charge of negligence of a contributory nature.

In 1931 Congress appropriated $769,170; in 1932, $793,180; in 1933 the appropriation dropped to $741,325; and it is now proposed to reduce that sum for safety work in 1934 $127,000.

I am informed by the safety division of the Bureau of Mines that by reason of the curtailed appropriation last year six mine rescue cars were withdrawn from the service; and if the $614,000 appropriation stands for the next fiscal year, the remaining four will be withdrawn. Mr. President, that means that there will be no mine-rescue cars in the largest coal-producing State in the Union—Pennsylvania.

It is thoroughly understood, of course, that this appropriation is for the operating of mine rescue cars and stations and investigation of mine accidents; for the investigation and improvement of mine rescue and first-aid methods and appliances and the teaching of mine safety, rescue, and first-aid methods; investigations as to the causes of mine explosions, causes of falls of roof and coal, methods of mining, especially in relation to the safety of miners, the appliances best adapted to prevent accidents, the possible improvements of conditions under which mining operations are carried on, the use of explosives and electricity, the prevention of accidents, statistical studies and reports relating to mine accidents, and other inquiries and technologic investigations pertinent to the mining industry; the exchange in part payment for operation, maintenance, and repair of mine rescue trucks; the construction of temporary structures and the repair, maintenance, and operation of rescue cars and Government-owned mine rescue stations and appurtenances thereto.

I assume my colleagues are interested to know specifically just how the appropriation for mine safety and rescue work was spent in the foregoing years. I shall cite but one example, which is typical. In 1931 the Division of Safety trained 112,230 miners in first-aid and mine rescue work; in 1932, 99,163 miners were trained, and it is estimated that by the end of the current fiscal year 65,000 miners will have been so instructed. It will be observed that there has been a steady decrease in this all-important instruction, and the Director of the Bureau of Mines forecasts that not in excess of 33,000 miners can be given this training in the fiscal year 1934 if the proposed appropriation is written into the act.

We are interested in safety in mines. Thirty-two States and the Territory of Alaska produce coal. Those of us who live in the coal-mining sections know what it means to make the mines safe for workers and employers.

We do not know what day a major accident will occur. I recall in my youth one of the worst accidents that ever occurred in a mining area where I resided. Hundreds of men were trapped in a mine when an explosion occurred. It affected nearly every home in the community. There were no mine rescue crews, no relief of any kind other than what the mine itself could give, no modern service as we know it now. In my memory, I not only see the victims being carried from the shaft on improvised stretchers, but I can see a common funeral. It was a tragic day in the community, a holiday of broken hearts and spirits. Such an accident is liable to again occur, and for us to be short of mine rescue crews, or to have them tied up as some of them are at present, is not practical economy, but almost criminal negligence.

The Secretary of Commerce informed me that four of the mine rescue cars under the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Mines have been tied up, and at present there is not a mine rescue car in operation west of the Mississippi River. We know that the distance between the various mining fields in the West is so great that the cost of transporting the cars would make a prohibitive drain on the depleted funds now available for travel. When there is even a minor accident, and the Government is unable to send relief, the people will not listen to the cry of economy. Let us not reduce the field forces of the safety division of the Bureau of Mines.

Reducing these appropriations would materially cripple their usefulness and hamper their accident-prevention work. The Bureau of Mines now contacts approximately 300,000 persons in mining and allied industries annually. I will not take the time right now to read a letter which I received from the Director of Mines, but believe it would be a good idea to have it printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF MINES,
Washington, December 6, 1932.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter dated Washington, D. C., November 30, 1932, regarding the effect of decreases in the allotments for the health and safety work of the United States Bureau of Mines has been received.

Since the decreased appropriations have been in effect but five months, their full effect in the curtailment of these types of work is not yet evident or available. However, a few of the effects are readily given:

Four of the mine rescue cars have been tied up and at present there isn't a mine rescue car in operation west of the Mississippi River, as the distances between the various mining fields in the West are so great that the railroad fares in moving the cars would have made a prohibitive drain on the depleted funds now available for travel.

The greatly reduced allotments for travel and supplies have forced numerous restrictions on the field forces of the safety division and this materially cripples their utility. One of the most effective means of putting up-to-date safety data and safety and accident-prevention work before the mine operators and mine workers has been that field men of the safety division, when supplied with ample travel funds, came into personal contact with approximately 300,000 persons in the mining and allied industries annually, and this has been found to be by far the most effective method of actually "putting over" up-to-date ideas on mine safety. This widespread personal contact is not possible under the decreased allotments, and one of the immediate effects will probably be that instead of training about 100,000 mine workers in first aid and mine rescue as has been done annually for the past several years, the number so trained for the present fiscal year will probably be but slightly over 50,000, certainly not as high as 75,000.

In many places the field work of the forces of the safety division requires considerable travel by automobile, as much of the work is done in small out-of-the-way places and at night. With the heavily depleted allotments for supplies and equipment it is not possible to provide automobiles for many of those who need them in their work; in some cases this prevents the first-aid and accident-prevention work from being done and in several cases the field men, some of them receiving but $1,740 per year, have purchased their own machines and use them in doing this life-saving work.

In one case when the decreased allotments made it desirable (almost necessary) to discontinue the payment of rent for one of the Bureau of Mines safety stations, and it was decided to move the station to another place where Federal space was available, the movement of the station was resisted by various interests, and in connection with the final decision to remain half of the rent for the safety station was assumed by two employees of the Bureau of Mines.

In the past, the policy of the bureau has been to maintain its various belongings in excellent physical condition, and this, of course, was particularly true of the structures and equipment of the safety division. The fact that everything was in most excellent condition at the beginning of the present fiscal year, with its curtailment of funds, will allow of operating this year without much necessity for repairs, replacements, or new purchases of supplies or equipment, but the continuance of the lowered allotments or the greater lowering of them can not fail to entail serious consequences in trying to maintain the health and safety work of this organization.

Cordially yours,

SCOTT TURNER, Director.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a telegram from Mr. Thomas Kennedy, secretary of the United Mine Workers of Hazleton, Pa., in the heart of the anthracite-coal region, which reads as follows:

HAZLETON, PA., February 6, 1933.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Senate Office Building:

In appropriation bill now pending in Congress it is contemplated to reduce appropriation for Bureau of Mines to extent of $127,000. In the allocation of this reduced appropriation it is believed that the safety work of the bureau will be seriously impaired. Express hope that contemplated reduction can be eliminated or modified so that Bureau of Mines will secure sufficient appropriation with which to carry on its work—include its very important safety work. Would urge your cooperation to the end desired.

THOMAS KENNEDY.

How will the employer and worker feel when they find the appropriation for safety cut? Every worker will know of it, and what will he say? How would you feel, as a miner going down into the earth to mine coal when you knew the Government had failed to appropriate money to have a car come to your rescue if an explosion or accident would take place? These men think about that. We can talk economy all we want to, but economy ought not to be achieved at the expense of humanity. At this time there is no sound reason for us to deny the Bureau of Mines sufficient funds to carry on its safety work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the bill under consideration was only brought to the attention of Senators within the past hour, and I doubt whether half a dozen Senators have read it or are familiar with its provisions. In hastily running through the bill during the reading of its provisions by the clerk, I misapprehended the nature of the item to which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just been speaking. The amendment which I offered, reducing the appropriation of the item in question, was submitted under a misapprehension as to the purpose and scope of the item in question. I would not have offered the amendment if I had known the purpose for which the appropriation was sought.

With reference to the bill as a whole, Mr. President, as I have hastily examined its provisions, I do not hesitate to say that it contains many items of appropriation that in my opinion may not, in view of the condition of the Treasury, be justified. Nearly every subdivision of the bill contains excessive appropriations aggregating several millions of dollars. If the Senate lived up to the statements not infrequently heard in this Chamber that we must balance the Budget, that economies must be introduced into the departments of the Government, and that cuts must be made in appropriations, this bill, instead of carrying items aggregating more than $103,000,000, would have carried appropriations not exceeding $75,000,000. In other words, Mr. President, the total appropriations provided in the bill under consideration should not have exceeded the amount just stated. I protest against what I conceive to be the improvident, not to say extravagant, appropriations which are found in the measure before us.

I regret that the Senator from Maine is compelled to leave the Senate within the next hour or so, owing to the serious illness of his brother. His anxiety to complete consideration of the bill is therefore justified. The Senate also is desirous of speeding the passage of the appropriation bills before adjournment; and this attitude of mind prevents proper consideration of the appropriation bills brought to our attention carrying, as they do, billions of dollars.

It is true that the President, through the Bureau of the Budget, has recommended appropriations in excess of those that have been reported by the appropriations committees of the House and Senate; but notwithstanding the reported reductions submitted by the appropriations committees, I can not help but believe that they have not sufficiently reduced appropriations, and that the aggregate appropriations recommended will exceed by several hundred million dollars the total amount which should be appropriated.

Mr. President, it is my belief that we are not carrying out our platform pledges, and are failing to introduce those economies, and effect those administrative reforms, which are so imperatively needed in the Federal Government. Senators have been eloquent in denouncing Federal extravagance and waste, in condemning useless bureaus and duplication in Federal activities; they have earnestly protested their determination to support measures that would reduce the expenses of the Government and bring about reorganizations and reforms in substantially all of the executive departments; but as the appropriation bills and other measures are brought before us for consideration it is becoming manifest that the promised reforms are not being effected, and that the demanded economies are not being realized.

The Federal Government is still operating in the track which it followed in 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929. Indeed, I believe the appropriations which we will make for the next fiscal year will exceed those carried in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928. It seems impossible when Federal organizations are created and official machinery is set in motion to bring about changes, to reduce the established mechanism and abolish Federal administrative and executive instrumentalities. The pressure from many quarters is so great that successful resistance to the same seems impossible.

Frequently attention has been challenged to the enormous increase in appropriations for the Department of Commerce, and from the declared opposition to these enormous increases one would have supposed that the appropriation for this department for the next fiscal year would have been reduced 40 or 50 per cent; but the bill before us carries an appropriation for the Department of Commerce amounting to more than thirty-six and one-half million dollars. Only a few years ago this organization consisted of but a corporation bureau, with an appropriation of only a few hundred thousand dollars; but it has, almost overnight, assumed gigantic proportions and calls for an appropriation greatly in excess of what is required.

The policy of the party in power during the past few years has resulted in a serious decline in our foreign trade and commerce. Our exports have shrunk billions of dollars annually. Imports have likewise been materially reduced. Policies are being urged by Republican leaders, as well as by many Democrats, which, if carried into effect, will practically destroy our foreign markets and cut us off commercially from the rest of the world. Notwithstanding the enormous heights of existing tariffs, demands are made for still higher duties; and not satisfied with present tariff walls, Congress is urged to create embargoes against all imports.

As I have stated, though our foreign commerce is rapidly approaching the vanishing point, millions of dollars are carried by this bill to furnish positions for hundreds of Federal employees, ostensibly to promote foreign trade. In one moment we urge tariffs and embargoes and the next moment appropriate millions to promote foreign trade. If it were not for the insistence of Senators that this bill be passed within the next hour, I should submit a number of motions with respect to specific items in this bill not only carrying appropriations for the Department of Commerce but for the Department of Labor and the Department of Justice.

I repeat, Mr. President, that this bill should be carefully examined by Senators before it is finally passed, and that many reductions should be made in items of appropriations, the total of which should be not less than $25,000,000.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the Department of Labor is subject to criticism for the unnecessary demands which it has made for appropriations in the past and for the next fiscal year. The bill before us carries, as I have stated, more than $12,646,000 for this department. One would suppose that the Department of Labor would earnestly seek economies, and the elimination of unnecessary bureaus and agencies; but I submit that a critical examination of this bill reveals that it has not pursued the course indicated. The amount carried in the bill for the Bureau of Immigration is, I submit, in excess of all legitimate demands. A few years ago hundreds of thousands of immigrants landed upon our shores annually and the duties of the department was thereby increased. My recollection is that for a number of years the number of immigrants annually coming to the United States exceeded 1,000,000. Recent legislation has restricted immigration so that less than 150,000 may legally enter the United States. There is too much machinery in the Department of Labor—too many organizations. The personnel is too large, and the cost of the department is entirely too great.

If time permitted I should refer to some of what I conceive to be unwarranted and arbitrary proceedings of some branches of the Labor Department. I sincerely hope that under the new administration there will be a thorough reorganization of the Labor Department, a consolidation of the activities of groups and agencies and bureaus therein, and important economies brought about.

Mr. President, many complaints have been brought to me with respect to the agency set up in the Department of Labor known as the Employment Service. I supported the plan which called for cooperation between the States and the Federal Government in finding employment in this period of depression. A large appropriation was made at the last session of Congress, and it was hoped that the Federal agencies that would be established by reason of the appropriation would properly function and cooperate in every way with State agencies. Information which I have indicates that this agency has taken on a partisan and political complexion; that persons have been employed who were not efficient, and some of whom were concerned in political activities. The able Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], as I am advised, intended to have something to say upon this item when this bill was under consideration, but he is absent from the Chamber at this time. I have examined some of the salaries paid to employees in this service and learned of some of the persons who have been, and still are, upon the pay roll. I wish that a better record might have been made than that which I think has been written. I can only express the hope that in the near future this organization will be made effective and that it will be purged of any partisan or political complexion.

I move to strike out of the bill lines 22 to 25, inclusive, on page 106, all of page 107, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 108, being the appropriation carried for the United States Housing Corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes to strike out, beginning with line 23, on page 106, down to and including line 3, page 108, as follows:

UNITED STATES HOUSING CORPORATION

Salaries and expenses: For officers, clerks, and other employees, and for contingent and miscellaneous expenses, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including blank books, maps, stationery, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, freight and express charges, communication service, travel expense, printing and binding not to exceed $150, and all other miscellaneous items and expenses not included in the foregoing and necessary to collect and account for the receipts from the sale of properties and the receipts from the operation of unsold properties of the United States Housing Corporation, the Bureau of Industrial Housing and Transportation, property commandeered by the United States through the Secretary of Labor, and to collect the amounts advanced to transportation facilities and others; for payment of special assessments and other utility, municipal, State, and county charges or assessments unpaid by purchasers, and which have been assessed against property in which the United States Housing Corporation has an interest, and to defray expenses incident to foreclosing mortgages, conducting sales under deeds of trusts, or reacquiring title or possession of real property under default proceeding, including attorney fees, witness fees, court costs, charges, and other miscellaneous expenses; for the maintenance and repair of houses, buildings, and improvements which are unsold; in all, $13,195: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $4,000 per annum, and only one person may be employed at that rate: Provided further, That no part of the appropriations heretofore made and available for expenditure by the United States Housing Corporation shall be expended for the purposes for which appropriations are made herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I now move to recommit the bill, with instructions to reduce the aggregate appropriations therein 10 per cent.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to call for a division. I merely want to say that, in view of our loud protestations in favor of economy, I believed that the motion which I just made would be carried, but it is evident that we talk a great deal about economy, but do not get results.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in view of the notice of intention to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 36, line 22, was rejected, I desire to state that in voting upon that amendment I intended to vote to sustain the action taken by the committee, but due to my misunderstanding, from the form in which the question was stated, I am advised that I voted against the amendment recommended by the committee. I merely wished to make this statement at this time, in view of the pending motion to reconsider the vote.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I desire at this time to move to reconsider the action taken by the Senate in failing to sustain the committee amendment on page 36, lines 22 to 25, and a portion of line 1, on page 37.

May I merely say to the Senate that, if the action of the committee is sustained, this particular feature of the bill will go to conference. The statement by the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] ought to give pause to anyone here who is in doubt on the subject. The previous vote on division was apparently carried by a majority of only one, and it is my hope that without further argument the Senate will now reconsider its action and sustain the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there is no principle involved as to the employment of prison labor. The only question involved in the amendment is whether, in this time of supreme depression, a new prison industry is to be started with labor-saving machinery so that convicts may work on labor-saving machines instead of by hand, going so far even as to provide paint-spraying machinery and singling out the industry of metal office furniture, which is a small industry, in the nature of an infant industry almost, subject to the most exceptional difficulties under the present depression, because practically nobody is opening up new offices and acquiring new furniture equipment.

I hope the Senate will understand that this is only to defer to another time an investment in labor-saving machinery. The convicts will not be any worse off than they have been hitherto, because this is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOSES. We are just opening the new penitentiary at Lewisburg, where no provision whatever has been made for the useful occupation of the convicts. Does the Senator wish those men to remain in idleness?

Mr. BULKLEY. The Director of Prisons claims he is going to employ about 10 per cent of those convicts, and that is all. That is all that is involved here. Whatever he is going to do with the other 90 per cent he can do with this 10 per cent. In order to employ those he proposes an attack on an industry that is already subject to the greatest difficulty.

Mr. MOSES. His attack goes to the point, as I remember, of one-tenth of 1 per cent of the total production of the country.

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not think that is right. There have been some figures submitted to that effect, and there are other figures submitted to the contrary. I think it is much higher than the Senator has indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was rejected.

On a division, the motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the chairman of the committee is very anxious to get away I am reluctant to detain the Senate even for a moment. I shall therefore be very brief.

There is an appropriation on page 26 of $8,440,000 for prohibition enforcement. I would like to take some time to discuss it, but not wishing to hold the Senator from Maine here, I am going to move that the figures "$8,440,000" be stricken out and "$4,220,000" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in the subcommittee which took up the bill we did cut off 10 per cent. We had a very good cause for cutting off 10 per cent. Subsequent to that the full committee restored the full amount by a very close vote. Therefore I move that the numerals "$8,440,000" be stricken out and the numerals "$7,700,000" in lieu thereof. This is a little less than a 10 per cent reduction. I hope the Senate will save at least that much in this appropriation at a time when the Budget is unbalanced, when we are going behind about $2,000,000,000 this year. I hope that at least we can cut down this appropriation a bare 10 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think we ought to cut this amount down somewhat. Therefore, in order to save even a small sum, I move that the numerals "$8,440,000" be stricken out and the numerals "$8,000,000" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have one more amendment. I move that the numerals "$8,440,000" be stricken out and "$8,400,000" be inserted in lieu thereof. This would constitute a saving of $40,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submitted a motion a few moments ago to recommit the bill with instructions to reduce the aggregate amount appropriated by 10 per cent. That motion was defeated. I now move to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to report back the bill carrying 5 per cent less than the aggregate amount now carried in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask that the clerks be authorized to correct the totals in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR EXECUTIVE OFFICE, ETC.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14458) making appropriations for the Executive office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposse.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah apparently does not realize that there is already unfinished business before the Senate. I yielded to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in order that he might leave tonight, as it is necessary for him to go away. I think I shall have to ask that the Senate proceed with the unfinished business to-morrow and let us see how we can get along with it.

Mr. SMOOT. There are only a few amendments to this appropriation bill. To-morrow I shall ask the Senator to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business that we may consider the appropriation bill to which I have referred.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I now ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the unfinished business, Senate bill 5125, before the Senate.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS—LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14562) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1242) thereon.

AMENDMENT TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 14458, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 22, line 8 (in the items for the Federal Trade Commission), to strike out "$780,000" and insert "$1,081,500"; in line 13, to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$20,000"; and in line 14, to strike out "$790,000" and insert "$1,101,500."

(Statement: This gives the Federal Trade Commission a total of about $8,000 less than the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget and makes the appropriation for printing $20,000, as recommended by the Bureau of the Budget.)

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE GOODWIN, OF MINNESOTA

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. GODFREY G. GOODWIN, late a Representative from the State of Minnesota, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 16, 1933.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GODFREY G. GOODWIN, a Representative from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That a committee of two Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 362) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. GODFREY G. GOODWIN, late a Representative from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. SHIPSTEAD and Mr. SCHALL as the committee on the part of the Senate under the second resolution.

RECESS

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 17, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

In the beginning God—back of the heroisms, of the loves, of the tragedies, of the emotions with their weepings and their laughters—behold, Thou art there. O Thou who art the judge of all the earth, because Thou art, there must be wisdom and love dominant over all. In the twilight of our imperfect knowledge help us to climb the altar stairs toward Thee. In the great realm of our Christian faith, may we find that which shall enable us to set in motion the great forces which are fundamental to our institutions and to our individual lives. Over the tumult and over the restless sea of our national life may we hear Thee calling and see Thy right hand. We wait in sorrow, we wait in our humiliation, and we wait in our self-reproach. Almighty God, we are most grateful for the preservation of the life of our President elect, and we rejoice to-day that there are no tears to dry, no wounds to bind, and no sufferer to tend and bless. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO FILE REPORT ON BILLS

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs may have the privilege until midnight to file reports on three or four bills.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PRESCRIBING OF MEDICINAL LIQUOR

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules for printing in the RECORD.

The report is as follows:

House Resolution 382

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 14395, an act relating to the prescribing of medicinal liquor; that after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SWEDISH SYSTEM OF LIQUOR CONTROL

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman consulted with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I have.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman conclude in five minutes?

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. I will.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the subject I am going to take up is a system I have conceived in my own mind in reference to the liquor question. It is simply a matter for Congressmen to study and see if they can work something out of it. It is to keep the saloon out of business.

The Constitution should be amended so that there could be put into operation a system of liquor control by the Federal Government acting in cooperation with the individual States which would allow each State to permit, by laws or regulations, its citizens to purchase liquor lawfully, a system similar to the liquor-control system of Sweden. This change in the Constitution would embody such proper adjustments of Federal and State power as would allow the United States to collect revenue from the sale of liquor and to permit the States and the political subdivisions of the States to collect a part of the total revenue which would be derived from this source. No State would be permitted to operate a liquor-control system which would authorize or sanction the return of the saloon, and States which desired to remain dry would have the protection of the Constitution not to allow shipment from a wet to a dry State. Such a constitutional amendment would authorize an amendment of the Volstead Act and the internal revenue laws by Congress so that the policy of regulated liquor control and revenue raising could be put into effect.

I would make this in two proposals: First, that the United States Government, under the Internal Revenue Department, should assume charge of the manufacture of distilled spirits and all classes of hard liquor, namely, whisky, brandy, rum, gin, alcohol, cologne spirits, under the law, a regulation providing for a tax of $1.10 a gallon on distilled spirits and $5 a barrel of 31 gallons on beer, ale, porter, and so forth, and the regular collection of tax on wines as of 1915, and also the import tax on all imported liquors as of 1915.

The operating distilleries would be subject to the laws of the United States and the eighteenth amendment as amended. Wines would be manufactured in the same manner as are prescribed under the internal revenue laws of the United States as of 1915.

Beer brewed by breweries, licensed by the United States Government, should be sold in both barrels and bottles and should be assessed at the rate of $5 per barrel, capacity 31 gallons.

All internal-revenue taxes should be collected by the collectors of internal revenue in their respective districts. These collections should be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The Treasury of the United States would assume the same jurisdiction over the manufacture and collection of tax as it did assume prior to the passage of the eighteenth amendment, including all regulations.

The United States Government should adopt its own system similar to the Bratt liquor-control system of Sweden. The way it should operate in the United States would be by States and their political subdivisions. Using the State of Pennsylvania for an example, if under this amendment, when passed, the State of Pennsylvania should desire to enter into and control the manufacture, importation, and sale of liquors, wines, and beer, the State would make application through its proper department to the Internal Revenue Bureau of the United States for a permit to allow one or more distillery, winery, or brewery to be built within the State. When this permission is granted, then the Government will assume the regulations as of 1915 to allow distilleries to be built in the State of Pennsylvania, assuming full charge as of the law of that date authorizing the manufacture of distilled spirits.

Presuming that two distilleries were allowed to be built in Pennsylvania, one at Pittsburgh and one at Philadelphia, these distilleries would, under the United States law, manufacture certain quantities of liquor in accordance with their permit, the Government assuming full supervision of the operating of the distillery from the standpoint of internal-revenue collections. Wineries and breweries would receive exactly the same permit by the United States Government as the distilleries, and would be operated under the law existing in 1915.

The Government of the United States would make all collection on tax payments of spirits, wines, and fermented liquors. Such collections would go into the Treasury of the United States.

Taking Pennsylvania as an example, in 1915 the total amount collected by the United States Government from distilled spirits, beer, wine, and imports was $20,000,000. Assuming that the same amount of business would exist at the present time under a new law, the Government then would collect through the sale of liquors in the State of Pennsylvania a total sum of $20,000,000 on a basis of $1.10 a proof-gallon tax on spirits, an average of from 6 to 20 cents on wines, and $5 per barrel of 31 gallons on beer. Predicating the sales in Pennsylvania on the basis of the tax collections of the United States Government, and allowing Pennsylvania practically the same profit on their sales as the Government collects on internal revenue, this would give the State of Pennsylvania a net profit of $20,000,000 per year. That profit should be divided equally between the treasury of the State of Pennsylvania and the political subdivision where the liquor was sold in the State of Pennsylvania.

In doing this you would put into the treasury of Pennsylvania $10,000,000 and $10,000,000 would go to the treasury of the political subdivisions, and the Government would deposit into its Treasury $20,000,000, making a total of $40,000,000 into the treasuries of these different subdivisions.

The sale and distribution of the liquors in the State of Pennsylvania would be done under a law that would be passed by the United States Government similar to the Bratt liquor-control system in Sweden, and I herewith make this proposal to the Congress of the United States in order to present a plan whereby liquors, wines, and fermented liquors can be manufactured, imported, and sold legally in the United States Government free from the return of the saloon and under a system that will insure temperance and sobriety. The Government of the United States will have full charge of interstate shipments under the Webb-Kenyon law and will continue to enforce the Webb-Kenyon law in all the States that prefer to remain dry.

I went to Sweden last summer and made an exhaustive study of the Bratt system of liquor control. My observation of this law convinces me that the Bratt system works well in Sweden and could work as well in the United States of America.

In my investigation I made inquiries of more than 20 hotel managers and have been informed by them there is no such thing as drunkenness in Sweden, and that the practice of renting rooms in their hotels for drinking purposes is quite unknown. However, they do drink wine and beer with their meals in the dining rooms and are always free from intoxication.

I interviewed many individuals in Sweden who are legally entitled to 4 liters of spirit for each month and all the wine and beer they may require. They universally praise the Bratt system of liquor control and inform me that they have no difficulty in controlling the habits of their children. They say there is no such thing as hip-pocket flasks being used by their sons in Sweden; in fact, by careful observation you can scarcely find flasks displayed for sale in Swedish shops.

As a visitor of Sweden I applied for a mot book—a spirit pass book—which entitled me for the month of July to 4 liters of spirit, equal to five bottles of liquor known in the United States as fifths or short quarts. Therefore, I took my place in line No. 75 and for 20 minutes stayed in this line to procure my allowance. It totaled up to $7.93. I came to the cashier, where I presented my list and the money, and was given a receipt. Then I advanced to a counter and a lady who was behind the counter wrapped up in a neat package the five bottles, and I returned with them to my hotel.

I went through this procedure for the purpose of finding out exactly what was necessary to secure for personal use the liquor that I was entitled to under the Bratt system.

Those in line were orderly and bought only what they needed and had it charged against their allowance on their mot book.

Some laboring men left with only half a liter, or what would be known in the United States as a pint, costing them not to exceed 50 cents; and as I watched these men and thought of the bootlegging system in America and the law-abiding system in Sweden I felt humiliated to think that such a wonderful country as the United States, with all its wealth and intelligence, would tolerate such conditions as we have in America when a country like Sweden can control the liquor traffic and abide by the law.

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE BRATT SYSTEM

The present organization of the Vin & Spriteentralen is as follows: The relatively very inconsiderable capital invested in the company, 15,000,000 Swedish crowns, consists of ordinary shares 400,000 crowns, and preferred shares 14,600,000 crowns. The holders of the preferred shares have only a limited influence, so that the holders of the ordinary shares always have a majority of votes at the meetings of the shareholders, and they receive a maximum dividend of 7 per cent. The dividend on the ordinary shares, which are owned by a syndicate consisting of 10 persons approved by the Government, is limited in a somewhat different manner. In reality it has hitherto amounted to between 6 and 7 per cent. The holders of the ordinary shares are bound to permit the State to redeem at par all the shares on demand.

The board of directors of the company consists of eight persons, half of whom, and among these the chairman, are appointed by the Government, while the other half are elected at a meeting of the shareholders; that is, by holders of the ordinary shares, who have a majority of votes. Two of the four auditors of the company are appointed by the Government, two are elected by the shareholders. There is a controlling director, appointed by the Government, who has to watch the current business.

The retail sale of spirits and wines is conducted by the system companies, at present numbering about 120. The number is limited by the law in such a way that it can very slightly exceed the above-mentioned figure. The number of shops, however, is not subject to any provision in the law.

THE MODE OF DISTRIBUTION OF LIQUOR IN SWEDEN BY OFF-LICENSE SALES

At the present time there are in Sweden 119 companies licensed to sell liquor by the bottle. To each of those companies is assigned a fixed district in which it exercises control.

Everybody wanting to buy liquor by the bottle must possess a pass book ("mot book"), issued by one of these companies. Nobody is allowed to have a pass book entitling to purchases at more than one company. If a person is traveling, he may exceptionally be enabled to make purchases from one company on a pass book issued by another, but he must obtain permission from the latter company.

In order to obtain a pass book a person must apply to the system company in question. In his application he must give his complete name, date, and place of birth, address, domicile; that is, all the information necessary for his identification. He has also to give such further information as will enable the system company to gain an idea of his conditions of life and the social sphere in which he lives. Thus the application form contains questions dealing with the number of members of his household, residence, income, and so on.

The information given by an application may, if necessary, be supplemented by the system company by means of inquiries from different authorities with which the companies are in close contact, as, for instance, the police, the guardians of the poor, the child-welfare board, the temperance boards, and so on. Some of these corporations are bound to send information to the system companies automatically without special inquiry. Thus it must be reported to the system companies if anybody is convicted for drunkenness or has committed some crime under the influence of intoxication. If a person is convicted, he is put into an infirmary for the treatment of alcoholics, and so forth. From other institutions, such as the guardians of the poor, the system companies obtain the information required by special arrangement.

After having received the application and the necessary information the system company must decide whether the applicant shall be allowed a pass book or not, and further, if a pass book is issued, how large a quantity he shall be permitted to buy.

The liquor act prescribes that no person under 21 years of age may receive a pass book. A considerable number of communities have, however, in virtue of their above-mentioned right of imposing further restrictions with respect to the sales of liquor, raised the legal limit of age to 25 years. Certain system companies which have not been compelled to do so by the local authorities have raised the limit of age to 25 years on their own authority. There are only a few companies that issue pass books to persons under 25 years of age; for instance, the Stockholm Systemet, which prescribes a minimum age of 23 years. In the act there are, further, certain fixed cases when a pass book must be refused. Thus, for instance, anyone is debarred from receiving a pass book who has been convicted of drunkenness more than once during the preceding two years or anyone who has committed a crime under the common law during the preceding three years, provided it is proved that the crime was committed under the influence of drink. Still the intention is by no means that what is prescribed by the law should be a complete enumeration of those cases in which a pass book should not be issued. On the contrary, it is the right and even the duty of the system companies to examine in every special case whether it is prudent to intrust a person with a pass book or not. In reality those who are debarred from receiving a pass book independently of some paragraph in the law are far more numerous than those whose applications are refused under specific legal provisions.

When a person has obtained a pass book the system company has the right and the duty to keep the holder under observation and to withdraw the pass book if it is found necessary.

As to the maximum quantity per month, this is fixed by the law at 4 liters. By the decision of the local authorities this limit has by some system companies been reduced to 3 or 2 liters, or even 1 liter. Then the system companies have to decide the quantity in each special case, within the limit prescribed by the law, or within the narrower limit fixed by the local authorities. The consideration to which it is necessary to attach most importance—apart from whether the applicant leads a sober and regular life—is the actual reasonable requirements of liquor, in view of the applicant's social standing and his personal circumstances on the whole. The application of this principle involves that the quantity shall be less when a pass book is issued to a person who has recently reached the minimum pass-book age than for an older person. This policy also renders it possible to influence young people in the direction of more moderate and sober habits. Two liters a quarter or 1 liter a month is the quantity usually allotted to a person who has not previously possessed a pass book. When the pass-book holder grows older his ration may, on special application, be increased. Men who have a household of their own—and consequently generally entertain more—are usually entitled to a larger quantity than those who have no household of their own. As a rule, only a householder who has reached 30 years of age is entitled to 4 liters a month. Women applying for pass books are generally granted considerably smaller rations than men. The normal quantity allowed to women pass-book holders is 1 or 2 liters a quarter. In some cases women are allowed to buy 1 liter a month. Larger quantities are the exception. As a rule, only one pass book is issued for each household. Either a married woman or her husband may have a pass book, but not both of them at the same time. Sometimes two pass books or more are granted to the same household if, for instance, the household numbers several grown-up men among its members.

As has been already indicated, abusers of alcohol are not generally permitted to have pass books. Yet in some cases it is considered to be more advisable—so that such persons may not try to get liquor by the illicit means—to grant pass books for small quantities, for instance one-third liter a week or one-half liter every second week, but this is only on the condition that they submit to the company's making inquiries at suitable intervals, in order to gain necessary information as to their use of the stipulated quantity, and that they promise to have nothing whatever to do with the illicit liquor traffic.

To meet a person's temporary requirements of a larger liquor quantity than his fixed maximum, which may occur on special occasions, in the case of persons who have to entertain a great deal at home, and also on exceptional occasions in the case of others, the liquor act contains a provision which entitles a system company to grant, for special occasions, an extra allowance over and above the 4 liters a month to a pass-book holder who has presented a written request and adduced adequate reasons.

While the maximum purchase of a pass-book holder's strong liquors is thus fixed in advance, there is no such limitation as regards wine. Only if some subsequent scrutiny of the purchases on a pass book—which it is the duty of the system company to make—shows that anybody is abusing his right of buying wine is a special limitation imposed in his case with regard to wine, and then in the first place with regard to strong wines.

Each system company keeps a card index in which is registered every holder of a pass book, everybody with whom the company on some occasion or other has come into contact, and everybody about whom the company has obtained information which may be of importance if they should desire a pass book later on. Moreover, there are, in every system-company shop, special card indexes of those who make their purchases at the shop in question. The cards are provided with the pass-book holder's own signature. When a person wishes to make a purchase he must use and personally sign an order form from his own pass book. The signature of the order form is, on the occasion of each purchase, compared with that on the card at the shop. Besides the order forms, a pass book contains special pages on which all purchases are stamped.

THE MODE OF DISTRIBUTION OF ON-LICENSE SALES, WHICH IS THE RETAIL OF WINES AND LIQUORS

The on-sales of wine are allowed to begin at 9 o'clock a. m., and the sale of spirits at 12 o'clock at the earliest. All on-sales have to stop at 10 o'clock at night. Yet the county governments, on the proposal of the local authorities, are entitled to permit an extension of the closing time to some later hour than 10 o'clock, which has been practiced to a very great extent. Furthermore, the law prescribes that on workdays before 3 o'clock p. m. and on Sundays and holidays before 7 o'clock p. m. on-sales may take place only in connection with meals. For the on-sale of intoxicants cooked food has to be procurable, with the exception that wine may be served in such confectioners' shops as do not sell cooked food. At the theaters, at circuses, variety shows, and other similar places, or at public dances, no on-sales are allowed to take place.

The county governments, however, have to some extent the right of granting exceptions from this prohibition. In a restaurant where the on-sales are limited to wine only, the proprietor is forbidden to allow spirits to be consumed by his guests. Moreover, a fine may be imposed upon any guest who has consumed spirits in a place of this kind. In a restaurant, liquors must not be served to a person who is visibly under the influence of intoxicants. Neither must liquors be served to anybody known as an abuser of alcohol nor to anybody whose age may be reasonably estimated at less than 18 years.

Apart from the sale by the glass of liquor and wines which may take place by special license on board passenger ships regularly traveling to foreign ports, and apart, further, from the sale by the glass of wine which, likewise by special license, may take place in the dining cars of trains or on board inland passenger ships, and finally, apart from those merely occasional licenses for selling wine by the glass which may be granted by the county governments in extraordinary cases where there may be need of it, all sales by the glass of spirits and wines are monopolized and are in the hands of the system companies. As has already been mentioned, they may manage the on-sales in the number of restaurants fixed by the authorities either directly or, in the case of one or more of those restaurants, by intrusting the license for selling liquors by the glass to private restaurant keepers. The actual conditions are, as has been mentioned above, that the system companies manage the on-sales directly or through subsidiary companies in a more popular type of restaurant, while the licenses for selling liquors in the higher-class restaurants are as a rule intrusted to private-restaurant keepers.

In all cases where a license is transferred, a special agreement has to be made between the system company and the restaurant keeper embodying conditions for the financial engagements between both parties, as well as for the arrangement of the sales from a social point of view.

The most important of the financial conditions of the agreement are the clauses which have been introduced according to the directions given by the royal board of control for the purpose of realizing that point of the liquor act already alluded to, which aims at disinterested management as far as possible, even on the part of the private-restaurant keepers. According to these clauses, the restaurant proprietor is allowed to sell at a profit only a certain fixed quantity of spirits and a certain quantity of strong wines. These quantities are called "profit quantities." For each restaurant the royal board of control has fixed a maximum profit quantity. Thus a system company can not increase the profit quantities without special permission from the royal board of control. On the other hand, when renewing the agreement with a restaurant the company may reduce them if circumstances should be deemed to justify such action. In so far as the restaurant keeper—who is bound to make all the purchases of spirits and of wines required for his business from the system company from which he has received his license—keeps his purchases of spirits and strong wines within the limits of the profit quantities, he is allowed to make his purchases at the cost price of the system company and has to pay the system company only a certain part—at present 25 per cent—of the difference between the cost price and the price he charges in the restaurant. If, on the other hand, he sells beyond the profit quantities, he must pay for the excess of spirits and strong wines at the same price as he has himself the right of charging to his customers. Moreover, the agreements contain clauses obliging the restaurant keepers to observe the price regulations that may be issued by the royal board of control. There exist at present price regulations of that kind as regards spirits, whereas the restaurant keepers themselves are allowed to fix the prices of wines, but have to report them to the system company.

The royal board of control has also, however, the authority to issue prescriptions as to conditions of a social nature, which have to be embodied in the agreements. In pursuance of this authority the royal board of control has issued prescriptions of such far-reaching effect that without exaggeration it may be said that these prescriptions, and not the provisions of the law, have given the Swedish on-license trade of to-day its essential characteristics. As has been already mentioned, the law provides that during a certain part of the day liquors may only be served with meals. The royal board of control has extended the scope of this regulation so as to prevent any consumption of spirits and strong wines in restaurants except in connection with a genuine meal; and, what is of very great consequence, a minimum price has been fixed for the meal that entitles a customer to liquor. The minimum price now is 1½ Swedish crowns. Thus, nobody can visit a Swedish restaurant merely to obtain spirits or strong wines. On the other hand, if he takes a meal in a restaurant he may consume such drinks with his meal. The quantities which may be served to a customer at a restaurant are also limited by the prescriptions of the royal board of control. As to spirits, the customer is allowed only a small quantity (7½ centiliters, or three small glasses) before 3 o'clock p. m., while he may have a larger quantity (15 centiliters; that is, three big glasses) after 3 o'clock. The greatest quantity of strong wines which may be served is one-fourth bottle. Besides, anybody desiring to be served with only one glass of strong wine may obtain it if he orders pastry or confectionery.

Just as hitherto it has been considered unnecessary to make special provisions aiming at disinterested management as regards light wines, it has also been thought unnecessary to make special provisions for the serving of light wines only in connection with meals or only in certain fixed quantities. Light wines have been deemed harmless from the point of view of sobriety, at any rate in a country where stronger intoxicants are obtainable.

The limit of alcoholic strength allowed for beer was raised to 3.2 per cent by weight and the wurt strength was raised to 10.5 per cent.

The above résumé will give you an idea of the Bratt liquor-control system in Sweden.

Now the proposition that confronts this country is whether this system could be adopted and successfully carried out in these United States of America. My judgment is that a modification of the Bratt system, adopted to meet the peculiar conditions existing in this country, would work out as successfully here as the Bratt system has in Sweden.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14643, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PRALL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it, debate had been closed on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to increase the amount of the appropriation in an item of the bill. The vote on that will come at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct, and the Clerk will again read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 16, strike out "$60,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$68,490."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, the reading of the amendment does not indicate what bureau or department it refers to. I suggest that it is an appropriation for the register of wills.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were 64 ayes and 65 noes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HOLADAY and Mr. CANNON.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous and contingent expenses, including telephone service, printing, binding, rebinding, repairing, and preservation of records; typewriters, towels, towel service, furniture and equipment and repairs thereto, books of reference, law books and periodicals, street-car tokens, postage, not exceeding $100 for rest room for sick and injured employees and the equipment of and medical supplies for said rest room, and all other necessary incidental expenses, $10,000.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 10, line 25, strike out "$48,585" and insert in lieu thereof, "$97,170."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that the paragraph to which the gentleman's amendment is offered has been passed. The amendment comes too late.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that my amendment was lying on the Clerk's desk. I was unable to hear what the Clerk was reading, and as soon as I got the attention of the Chair I offered my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Another paragraph had been read, and the Chair thinks the amendment clearly comes too late. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT AND MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES

For checks, books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, newspapers, stationery; surveying instruments and implements; drawing materials; binding, rebinding, repairing, and preservation of records; ice; repairs to pound and vehicles, not to exceed $500; traveling expenses not to exceed $2,000, including payment of dues and traveling expenses in attending conventions when authorized by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; expenses authorized by law in connection with the removal of dangerous or unsafe and insanitary buildings, including payment of a fee of $6 per diem to each member of board of survey, other than the inspector of buildings, while actually employed on surveys of dangerous or unsafe buildings; and other general necessary expenses of District offices, $27,000: Provided, That no part of this or any other appropriation contained in this act or of any appropriation which may now be available shall be expended for printing or binding a schedule or list of supplies and materials for the furnishing of which contracts have been or may be awarded.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CANNON: Page 12, line 2, after the word "act," strike the words "or of any appropriation which may now be available."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is merely to correct a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For allowances for furnishing privately owned motor vehicles in the performance of official duties at the rate of not to exceed $264 per year for each automobile, $7,380: Provided, That allowances under this appropriation shall be made only to persons whose duties require full-time field service or whose duties require frequent travel outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Missouri why he allows $264 per year in this paragraph for each automobile, and in the case of the dairy inspectors he allows $311 per year?

Mr. CANNON. For the reason that the automobiles referred to in this paragraph are used exclusively on city pavements, while the dairy inspectors are required to use farm and country roads, which necessarily involves additional consumption of gas, oil, and tires and other relatively greater expense.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman's attention to the language—or whose duties require frequent travel outside of the District of Columbia.

Those are the concluding words in the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. That is the distinction between the two scales of allowance.

Mr. GOSS. Does the gentleman think that is a fair arrangement?

Mr. CANNON. We studied the matter extensively and reduced all of these automobile allowances, but the evidence adduced before the committee indicated that the dairy inspectors incurred a greater expense and were entitled to a larger allowance.

Mr. GOSS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For advertising notice of taxes in arrears July 1, 1933, as required to be given by the act of February 28, 1898, as amended, to be reimbursed by a charge of 50 cents for each lot or piece of property advertised, $8,000.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee whether or not this amount of $8,000 is fully reimbursed by the payment of the 50 cents each for the advertisement for sale of properties in arrears for taxes?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; that is completely covered.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. This item of 50 cents is the amount charged for each property advertised for taxes in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CANNON. That is the information given the committee.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that this is a very reasonable charge for this purpose and much less than the charge made in the States for similar purposes.

So much has been said lately about mortgage foreclosures, advertisements of property for sale by foreclosure, and for taxes until I feel that it may not be amiss for some observations to be made touching these subjects at this time. I regret that during this awful depression any person should be forced to pay out money for the advertisement of their property for sale for taxes or for sale under a foreclosure.

If a debtor can not pay the principal amount of his loan or can not pay his taxes, how is he to be able to pay these and pay, in addition, advertising fees, court cost, and attorneys' fees? I am a lawyer and understand the matter of attorneys' fees from the lawyers' standpoint. But let me say that during this emergency I feel that all lawyers should use every honorable means to adjust claims against those who are not able to pay, before the cost of foreclosure is placed on top of the already unbearable burden of debt which is now crushing the very lives out of our people. I fear that too often foreclosures are filed, for purposes other than the real and bona fide purpose of making the principal and interest only out of the debtor. I assert that no suit should be filed now unless necessary to protect the claim of the creditors. If the debtor is doing all he can to pay his debt, and the effect of the judgment is to simply pile up additional charges against him without making the creditor safer, the filing of a suit is unnecessary, should not be authorized, and should never occur. I also declare that any loan concern which advertises and sells property simply for the purpose of adding on unnecessary attorneys' fees, or for the purpose of buying in the property at a sacrifice and then reselling it at a sacrifice and for less than the debtor is willing to pay and for less than he would pay if given a chance, should receive the condemnation of all honest men.

What I have said is especially true of the Federal land banks of the country, which were set up for the protection of the farmers and are now being operated for the selfish interest of the officials of these concerns, without regard to the welfare of the farmers of the Nation and to the everlasting shame of all men who now are helping to further the outrageous designs of these banks or who may help them in the future to get more of the taxpayers' money and thus more power. These banks should be put into the hands of receivers at the earliest possible moment and the few farmers of the country who owe them and have escaped their clutches so far, saved from utter annihilation.

Mr. Chairman, I do not blame any man for taking such steps as may be necessary to protect his interest under the law. I am criticizing, though, those who take steps to destroy the farmers and the ordinary debtors when nothing is to be gained by the process except an added unnecessary expense, with a probable loss of much that could have been saved by a more helpful, saner course.

Of course, I do not criticize any attorney for filing suit for foreclosure, if his client insist on this being done, or if the attorney bona fide believes that such course is necessary. I only believe that the attorney should, during these awful times, adjust as much of these matters as possible by a settlement, saving and protecting both the creditor and the debtor.

To my mind, it is unthinkable that any attorney would purposely advise foreclosures—when he believes such unnecessary—for the sole and only purpose of making attorneys' fees. If perchance there should be such, let me say they are unworthy of the proud title of an attorney at law.

Surely no one who has been trusted by the people as an official to handle their affairs would stoop so low as to advise, seek, or in any way endeavor to secure loan foreclosures or the advertisement and sale of property for taxes in order that he—an officer—should make unnecessary and improper profits as the result of such procedure. And it is entirely beyond my conception of fair dealing and honesty of men dealing with men that the owner or editor of a newspaper or anyone interested in such a paper should procure or endeavor to procure or bring about the advertising of property for sale for taxes or in any way, when the people are unable to pay their debts or taxes, and when it is known that the people are honest and can not pay even their own taxes—much less their taxes and additional advertising fees and other costs.

Again let me say that I make no objections to any attorney, or county officer, or editor of a paper, or any other person who does these or any of these in the discharge of his duty. I am saying, though, that no man who is patriotic and wants to see his fellow man relieved from the awful effects of this depression and who unselfishly is doing all he can to serve his fellow man, will at this awful moment stir up and bring about unnecessary litigation, foreclosures, and tax advertisement simply and solely for the purpose of robbing those who have already been robbed and robbed and now left to die.

Mr. Chairman, let me say that this Nation and its people need, as never before, a new baptism of patriotism and brotherly love. If it was only possible for all selfishness to be eliminated and only such laws enacted as are for the interest of the whole people, the depression would be forever eliminated and we would soon have the most happy and prosperous people since the beginning of time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Highways Department: For personal services, $176,990.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOLADAY: Page 17, line 3, strike out "176,990" and insert in lieu thereof "186,480."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I want members to consider this amendment in connection with another amendment that will be offered on page 22. On page 22 there is a provision which prohibits the use of the testing laboratory in the highway department, and if that prohibition goes out of the bill the amount here should be increased. I am inclined to think that when the report was prepared they did not exactly understand the situation. We have had in the District of Columbia a testing laboratory for 40 years. During the last few years it has been on the fifth floor of the District Building. About two years ago a new building was constructed and equipped, and the value of that building, together with the new machinery and the old machinery, is something like $100,000.

In that laboratory tests of all materials used not only in the highway department but in all branches of District construction are performed. Now it is proposed to close that laboratory in order to save the salaries of nine men, and have the work done at the Bureau of Standards. There will be only eight men next year. Three of those men work on the outside. Three work in the laboratory. Three divide their time between the laboratory and the outside. Next year there will be only two working the laboratory, and the other three will divide their time between the outside and the laboratory. The proposition in the report is to transfer this work to the Bureau of Standards and have it done free of charge. There is no question but what the Bureau of Standards can do this work. It is largely mechanical, but they are not organized to do that work. We are not only failing to save money by making this reduction that has been made but we are actually losing money. Last year and during the present year the Federal Government has been having its testing done at this laboratory. Last year the Federal Government paid to the District government $10,122 for testing. So far the current year, up to last Saturday, the Federal Government had paid $9,632 actual cash to the District government. It will cost during the coming year $9,490 to operate the testing laboratory. So that if this provision against the laboratory is taken out and we put in this $9,490, we will not only get all of the testing done for all of the District but on the basis of seven months there will be a net profit paid by the Government to the District.

The Bureau of Standards does not want to do this work. They are not organized to do it. In spite of the fact that the Bureau of Standards is purely a Government institution, the Government, through the Treasury Department, made a contract with the District, and is having its testing done there. If this laboratory is closed, the three inspectors who work in the field will still be employed. That leaves 5 men, and only 2 of the 5 can be saved.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is this laboratory available to the Federal Roads Department that is under the Department of Agriculture for giving information and making tests of materials and supplies to aid the various States of the Union?

Mr. HOLADAY. Not unless this laboratory would do it as a matter of courtesy, which I understand they sometimes do. Sometimes the laboratories exchange work as a matter of courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I can not understand what has come over our friends on the other side of the aisle. When the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], aided by his colleague from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], than whom I do not believe there have been in the past two Members who have been more zealous or more faithful or more valuable in trying to cut down expenses, were in charge of this bill we Democrats backed them up 100 per cent in trying to cut down expenses. We gave them our help and support, both in the committee and on the floor. Now, when there has been a change politically, fortunately for the country and unfortunately for themselves, when they are going out of office on March 4, they are now leading the entire Republican Party across the aisle in voting en masse, with one exception, for all increases and proposals of spending more public money. We have one good, old reliable Republican here who still votes with us, but with that single exception we see the entire Republican force marching through tellers trying to raise the appropriations.

I am getting the same kind of letters that you are getting. My mail is cluttered with them every morning. Here is a letter that just came this morning from the Logan Iron & Steel Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., and its president, Mr. Kennedy, says:

Day by day business is growing worse. I am responsible for a business that used to employ 450 people and now it is down to 150.

Then he demands of Congress that we cut down this eternal spending and that we stop appropriating more money than the Government has with which to pay bills. I have a whole bunch of such letters here from people in the East as well as from other parts of the country, demanding economy and retrenchment. Every time we try to save money in any of these bills some man who is a friend of this employee or a friend of that bureau, just because of personal friendship, offers an amendment to increase the appropriations.

Now, there is not a bit of necessity for this extra money that my friend from Illinois is asking to have put into this bill. It would be wasted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have only five minutes. The gentleman from Nebraska will have his time and he can answer me then. I call on the committee now and the chairman, if I am incorrect, to correct me when I say that my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] never raised one question on this item to increase it in the hearings of the committee.

Mr. HOLADAY. Just a minute. I never knew it was proposed to decrease it. I was never consulted about it. I never knew the committee intended to decrease it.

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend was not there when we marked up the bill in committee, it is the first Congress he was not present doing his duty, because heretofore he has been one of the most zealous men in the performance of duties I have known here for the past few years. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit, there is no question that it was discussed in the committee. You will find it fully reported in the hearings.

Mr. BLANTON. But the chairman knows we discussed this very item for at least two hours and a half in the committee.

Mr. HOLADAY. What day was that?

Mr. BLANTON. It was the day the gentleman was not there. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLADAY. Does the gentleman from Texas know anything about this amendment? If so, I would like to hear him discuss it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] has taken his five minutes and since his collaborator from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], who tried to put on the agricultural bill last year $785,000, was it, for grasshopper extermination—how much was it?

Mr. GOSS. A million.

Mr. BLANTON. A million dollars for the extermination of grasshoppers—since he is going to follow me, the other side of the argument will be ably presented, hence I must use my own time. The testimony before this committee brought out the fact that right now without one dollar of expense the District government could have these tests made in the Bureau of Standards. They would not be charged a nickel for it. Is not this so, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CANNON. That is true. It is so provided by law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to repeat to the House that which I said yesterday, that I think no one knows more than I do of the tremendous amount of work involved in the handling of an appropriation bill, and in particular this bill. No one knows more than I do just how thankless a task it is, and no one knows more than I do the volume of work the chairman of this subcommittee the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has done.

I regret very much that there should be any dispute about certain items in this bill. It is true that in the years when I handled the bill the Members on both sides of the aisle supported the committee. I think in all fairness, however, it ought to be said that we never came in with a bill that did not have the unanimous support of the subcommittee. For this reason we were able to appeal alike to Members on both sides of the aisle to support the committee.

I was absent from the city on official business of the House when the hearings on this bill were held. I was not present at the time the bill was marked up. Notice did not get to me. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] on this floor has said that he was present at every meeting in which the bill was considered, and the bill was not marked up; that he did not approve the report. The statement was made to the full Committee on Appropriations with the request that the subcommittee further act on this bill before reporting it on the floor of the House. Now, I say this in justice to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY]: At all times he has indicated he was not satisfied with this bill; and at all times when I was chairman of these bills we came out with a unanimous report of the subcommittee in charge of the bill and received almost unanimous support of the House.

My friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] criticizes me erroneously, as he did on yesterday and at other times, for what he claims is a desire to spend money. His desire is to save money for the Federal Treasury. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] will save money to the Federal Treasury. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is confusing the matter, because this proposal advanced by the gentleman from Illinois will cause the District government to pay the cost of testing paving for the District government. The bill as proposed by the committee places this burden upon the United States Treasury and the Bureau of Standards and relieves the District government of the expense. Now, if the gentleman wants to save the Federal Treasury, as he so strenuously advocated, let him support the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. BLANTON. At the Bureau of Standards we now have experts, equipment, machinery, and everything necessary to do the testing, and we are assured that it can and will be done without extra expense.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; we do not have the experts. The Bureau of Standards do not want to do this work. They are a scientific organization. This is a matter of practical work that is done by every city in the United States. Why should the Federal Treasury pay for the United States Bureau of Standards testing the paving in the city of Washington when it does not do it for any other city in the United States? That is the issue. To be consistent, this is one amendment upon which we should have the support of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I note that my good friend the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] says he was not present when the bill was marked up. I must agree with that statement. He is completely absolved from any responsibility for any provision in this bill. This committee met every day, week after week, month after month, and, while the gentleman is a member of the committee, he never on any day, at any time, attended any meeting of this committee. He probably knows more about District affairs than any other Member of the House, and we were anxious to have the advantage of his counsel and advice, and I frequently telephoned his office personally urging that he meet with the committee, but he never came. Now he comes in here and filibusters against every economy in the bill. As he has not at any time attended a single meeting of the committee during the entire session of Congress, it is not surprising that he is not informed on the matter to which he refers. If he will consult the hearings he will find a citation there of the statute under which the Bureau of Standards supplies this service without charge to the District.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the work is done at the Bureau of Standards, does not the United States Government pay the cost of doing the work?

Mr. CANNON. The bureau has the equipment and the personnel. It is there, and the United States Government pays for its maintenance whether it is used or not. And when the District does avail itself of the service the same equipment is used without additional cost to the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. But who will pay the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. There will not be any bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is absurd.

Mr. CANNON. Who is paying the bill? Who has been paying the bill for the Bureau of Standards all these years? It will continue to operate just as it has been operating. The only difference will be that there will be but one bill instead of two bills. Under the present system the Federal Government is paying the bill at the Bureau of Standards and the District of Columbia is paying the bill at the District laboratory. Two establishments duplicating facilities and presenting two bills where there should be but one.

And under the law the Bureau of Standards is required to supply this service to the District without charge. I have been on this floor for many years, and it is the first time I have ever known the District to refuse to take something for nothing from the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, we have been building this city for over 150 years. We managed to build it up to the last year or two without this laboratory which the gentleman seems to consider so indispensable. And we can continue to build the city just as efficiently and test such materials as require it either at the plant at which produced or at the Bureau of Standards.

It is the finest laboratory of its kind, not only on this continent but in the world. I am at a loss to understand why the gentleman objects to using a magnificent institution of this kind and insists on putting up a little laboratory down town at a heavy cost to the taxpayers of Washington to do the work that can be done at this great institution justly famed throughout the world. It is one of the many instances of duplication to make jobs for deserving friends down town to propose to put up such a laboratory within a half mile of the United States Bureau of Standards and compel the District to pay high prices to have this work done when it can be done at the Bureau of Standards without any cost to the District whatever.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. HOLADAY. I think the gentleman is a little mistaken there. Of course, the Bureau of Standards can do this work, but they are not organized.

Mr. CANNON. There is no institution of its kind better organized anywhere on the globe; and none better equipped or better manned. Its scientists are men of international reputation; and it is so efficiently managed that I heard the chairman of another Subcommittee on Appropriations say that it is one of the few enterprises in which the Government is getting value received for every dollar invested.

I talked with the Director of the Bureau of Standards, Dr. Lyman J. Briggs, over the telephone yesterday just before the House met and he assured me that, while they did not solicit the work, they were equipped to handle it and would be glad to take care of it if it were delegated to them, and that under the law such service was supplied the District of Columbia free of charge.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman answer one more question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLADAY. If that is the case, why did the Federal Government last year pay to the highway laboratory $10,122 to do their testing, and why have they up until last Saturday paid $9,622?

Mr. CANNON. To which laboratory does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOLADAY. They have paid that to the District. There is something the gentleman did not know anything about.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; but how much did it cost the District to do that work? The committee went into this matter very thoroughly, and we found it was costing the District annually out of all proportion to its advantages when the same work could be done free at the Bureau of Standards.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLADAY) there were—ayes 40, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northwest: For the widening to 70 feet and repaving the roadway of Thirteenth Street, Massachusetts Avenue to Logan Circle, including the necessary replacement and relocation of sewers, water mains, fire alarm and police patrol boxes, $75,000: Provided, That in widening and repaving this roadway, 40 per cent of the entire cost thereof shall be levied against and collected from the owners of the abutting property in the manner provided in the act approved February 20, 1931 (46 Stat., pp. 1197–1199). The owners of abutting property also shall be required to modify, at their own expense, the roofs of any vaults that may be under the sidewalks or parking on said street if it be found necessary to change such vaults to permit of the roadway being widened.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Under present law is 40 per cent paid by the abutting property?

Mr. CANNON. This is an exception to the rule. This is a widening item and it merely applies the usual law to this case.

Mr. GOSS. Without this language would it be 40 per cent? I have no objection to that part of it, but I think we are soaking them pretty hard if we also require that they must repair all roofs to vaults, and that sort of thing. The language beyond the 40 per cent would suggest that the 40 per cent is an increase, because I do not think there is any such amount required at the present time.

Mr. CANNON. I may say that we are making a concession here to the property. Ordinarily, in matters of this kind, the charge to the property owner is 50 per cent, and here we are providing for 40 per cent.

Mr. GOSS. That is fair to all the property owners; but, on the other hand, on this particular street it occurs to me that many of these stores, and so forth, would be soaked when it comes to paying for changing vaults in addition to paying the 40 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. I think they are entirely satisfied. This is a specific item widening this specific street, and the property owners were taken into conference.

Mr. GOSS. And they had no objection?

Mr. CANNON. I think they had no objection. The committee received no complaint of any kind.

Mr. GOSS. On the statement of the gentleman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the surfacing and resurfacing or replacement of asphalt, granite block, or concrete pavements with the same or other approved material, $450,000.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLADAY: On page 19, line 16, strike out "$200,000"——

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this paragraph has been read and the subsequent paragraph has been read.

Mr. HOLADAY. No, Mr. Chairman; I had difficulty in following the Clerk, and I did not catch the point until he started on the next line.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Clerk had finished the paragraph ending in line 19, with the sum of $450,000, and the Clerk will so inform the Chair.

Mr. HOLADAY. No; I think he has not completed it.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; he has completed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has completed the reading of the paragraph, and the point of order of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is sustained.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLADAY: On page 19, line 19, strike out "$450,000" and insert "$550,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 12 minutes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I say that I have some five or six amendments involving the same proposition, and it may be that this amendment will practically dispose of the others. Will the gentleman let the debate run on this amendment for a few minutes longer?

Mr. CANNON. No; I am certain the gentleman wants to see us make some progress on the bill.

Mr. HOLADAY. I do.

Mr. CANNON. We have to rise at 4 o'clock; and if it is agreeable to the gentleman, we would like to limit debate to 12 minutes, and I may say that this does not leave any time for myself at all. I am giving up all my time.

Mr. HOLADAY. It may be that if we could have more time on this amendment we could save considerable time later on.

Mr. CANNON. If it is agreeable to the gentleman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, this is one of a series of amendments and goes really to a question of policy. Under the law the money gathered from the gasoline tax may not be expended for any other purpose except streets. The Budget estimates, I think, total about $1,000,000. The committee cut this to about $500,000.

Under the bill as written we will have something like $1,250,000 in the gas fund, which may not be expended for any purpose except the improvement of streets. The streets affected by this amendment and the other amendments I may offer are not matters of emergency. It does not make any particular difference whether they are improved this year or the next, they must be paid for out of this money; but here is a question I would like to bring to the attention of all the members of the committee, and it is a question of policy.

Later on we will be confronted in the consideration of this bill with a proposition of expending $625,000 for relief. I believe it is better public policy to take this money which is on hand, and which may not be expended for any other purpose, and expend it for legitimate and needed improvements and give the men work rather than to close down the work, keeping the money in the fund, and appropriating money out of the general tax fund for the relief of unemployment.

As I have said, the other amendments I have in mind are not matters of emergency. They can wait. Every street item in here can wait, so far as that is concerned; but it is a question of policy as to whether you want to accumulate this $1,250,000 in the gas fund that may not be expended for anything else, and then out of the general fund appropriate money for the relief of the poor.

I think it is better to appropriate $1,000,000 out of the gas fund and furnish employment than it is to appropriate $500,000 to feed the men who will not have an opportunity to work.

I have no more interest in this question than any other Member on the floor. It is simply a question of policy whether or not it would not be better to take the money we have, furnish work for 2,000 men throughout the District than to take a half a million dollars or more out of the public funds for the relief of the poor.

If the committee favors a general policy that it is better to hoard the money and appropriate for general relief, I do not know that I will introduce the rest of the amendments. I have amendments prepared which would provide a million dollars for this work, an increase of half a million dollars. But I expect that this may be a fair test of what the House desires to do.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will this half a million dollars come out of the Treasury of the United States or the surplus of the District of Columbia? My vote depends upon the answer.

Mr. HOLADAY. It will come out of the surplus in the gas fund.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then we are not taking the taxpayers' money back home to improve the streets of Washington and give work to the unemployed, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] indicate?

Mr. HOLADAY. No. I think it is better to spend half a million dollars to give employment than it is to take the money out of the General Treasury.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, our friend speaks of a policy being involved. If you adopt his amendment, you raise the item $100,000. That will be $100,000 wasted. What is a hundred thousand dollars to Brother HOLADAY, of Illinois? He seems to have forgotten what such sums of money mean to the people. It is the aggregate of all these items, the hundred thousand dollars here and a hundred thousand dollars there that is causing the present deficit in the Public Treasury.

Now, the policy I am thinking about is a sound, sane business policy that this Government must adopt of curtailing its expenses. You have got to curtail the expenses of the Government, you have got to cut them down and reduce the taxes of the people.

Now, my friend from Illinois, instead of trying to raise this item in this bill an additional hundred thousand dollars, ought to be on the floor right now trying to take off the extra 1-cent letter postage that his Postmaster General put on the backs of the people of the United States. He ought to reduce the postage back to 2 cents on letters. He ought to be here trying to take off from the electric power the amount of the tax put on last year. That is a terrible burden on the people. He ought to be here putting his shoulder to ours to help take off these inexcusable taxes that were laid on the backs of the people. He ought to be here trying to help take off this infamous, ridiculous, unreasonable, baseless 2-cent tax on bank checks that is making the people all over the United States draw their money out of their banks.

I wish all of these fellows that are writing various Members of Congress that they must cut down expenses, telling us that we do not know what the people are thinking about—I wish they would concentrate on the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] and say, "You boys stop offering these amendments to increase appropriations and back up the committee."

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not just now.

Mr. SIMMONS. As long as the gentleman named me, will he yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I will always yield to a man if I name him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I opposed these special taxes that the gentleman mentions, and the record of the House will show it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman opposed them then, but he must keep on opposing them until we repeal these taxes and they are taken off of the backs of the people.

Mr. SIMMONS. This amendment here will not affect those taxes one penny.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further.

Mr. SIMMONS. My attention is called to the fact that the Democrats put those taxes on the people.

Mr. BLANTON. No; we did not. I fought against all of them. The gentleman knows who put the extra cent on postage. It was his high-hatted Postmaster General—who had to build a special Government limousine high enough to carry his silk hat. I want to tell my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] that the six and a half million dollars in this bill comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Missouri and the other States in the Union, to help carry on the business of Washington.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, just a minute. This bill is going to the other end of the Capitol, and there are some gentlemen somewhere else—I will not say where they are—who get full-page pictures of themselves in the Washington newspapers for raising this amount that is taken out of the Federal Treasury, and when the bill gets back here it will have a million or a million and a half dollars added to it, that your taxpayers, already overburdened in Missouri, have to raise and pay toward the civic expenses of the city of Washington. So, after all, it comes out of the pockets of the people, and that is why I am up here trying to back up this committee, which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] have always backed up heretofore, in trying to cut down expenses.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman from Missouri recognized? It was my understanding that the time was to be divided.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed for three minutes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the question is not whether we are going to reduce the postage rate from 3 cents to 2 cents—I voted against that increase—or reduce any other tax, nor is the question how the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] voted in the past or how they are going to vote in the future. I asked the gentleman from Illinois whether, if this amendment was adopted, the money would come out of the surplus belonging to the people of the District of Columbia and not out of the United States Treasury, and he replied that it would. Then it does not mean any tax upon the people throughout the country. According to the gentleman from Illinois, it will come out of the surplus funds belonging to the people of the District of Columbia. Now that is plain and should be understood.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman know that out of every dollar spent in the District, the people of the United States contribute over 20 cents, and the people of the District contribute less than 80 cents?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If that be the case, and we appropriate six or seven hundred thousand dollars or a million dollars for relief, and if out of every dollar we appropriate for relief in the District of Columbia the people back home are paying 20 cents, would it not be better to put the unemployed people in the District of Columbia to work and quit appropriating this money for relief? As to this money, however, it is not in the class the gentleman refers to.

Mr. CANNON. What is the Federal Government doing for the unemployed in the city of St. Louis? Why does not the gentleman take a little interest in the unemployed there? Why should the taxpayers of St. Louis pay to support the unemployed of Washington when St. Louis has unemployed of its own?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is not the question here, but I do take an interest in the people in St. Louis, they know I do, and I want the legislative body in the city of St. Louis to put the people to work on public work just as much as possible. My duties require me to legislate for the District and I will do for the District what I want the legislative body of St. Louis to do for the unemployed there.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Under my amendment the money would come out of the gas fund, and the States would not contribute one cent.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield to the gentleman from Missouri, as I already recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] insists on monopolizing the time. He has been recognized and has spoken and now he proceeds to make another speech in the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How can the gentleman say that? I have but three minutes. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. Let us get the facts from the author of the amendment.

Mr. HOLADAY. The money to pay the amount provided for in my amendment comes out of the gas fund.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri has yielded to me.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's three minutes have expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] keeping track of the time, or is the chairman of the committee doing it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has the floor and he refuses to yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me? There ought to be at least one word in behalf of Federal economy?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield to the gentleman from Missouri. I control the three minutes, not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] will listen to me, not one cent of this money provided for in my amendment will be paid out of the taxes contributed by the United States. It all comes from the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend I desire to say it is evident the gentleman from Missouri wants to divert me from the question before the committee by speaking of conditions in St. Louis. We are now legislating for the District of Columbia for citizens who have no voice in this Chamber, and I am going to vote on questions before us the same as I would if legislating for my own city. There is no legislation that you can present that will give work to the unemployed in St. Louis or any other place that I will not support. I have stated this many times since the depression started and I will continue to say so. How are you ever going to get back to normal if you will not put the people back to work? I know the farmers are in distress. I generally follow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] on farm legislation. I voted for millions a few days ago to enable the farmers to purchase seed so they could plant a crop. The question here is, Will you vote to appropriate money, not a dollar of which comes out of the pockets of the people of the country but comes out of a special gas-tax fund, to improve streets so that you can give work to the unemployed—the unemployed who are being fed from appropriations which we all voted for a few days ago? If we can give these men work, then we will not have to be voting the money of our people to feed them. That is the question here; but there are Members who would cloud the issue, who insist upon saying that this money will come out of the pockets of the people of the country. It has been made perfectly clear that it comes out of the gas-tax fund, which is collected solely in the District of Columbia and is to be used for this very purpose. I repeat, it is better to give men work when there is money available, as is the case here, rather than appropriate money, part of which is contributed by the States, to feed the unemployed in the District. A vote for this amendment will save the people back home money rather than add to their burdens.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for one minute.

Mr. GREEN. My colleagues, I have just returned from a few days' absence, having been called home on account of my mother's serious illness. In the States which I passed through I found thousands of our people in destitute circumstances. I found them closing their doors in failure and bankruptcy. I found the unemployed sitting by the roadside. I found in the mouth of practically every responsible citizen a word about the cost of government and the burden of government and the imperativeness of reducing the cost of government.

The American people are groaning under the cost of government and high taxes. They can not endure further tax burdens; in fact, homes are now being sold to meet taxes.

As I return to this Chamber I find a group here undertaking to lay greater burdens upon the backs of those destitute people. I want to ask my colleagues who are sponsoring these amendments how you expect the American people to continue to bear the increases in taxation that the Congress is imposing upon them?

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman want an answer?

Mr. GREEN. Not in my time, because no one can answer the reasons for higher taxes, when our people are now burdened to almost financial destruction. A $5,000,000,000 tax burden has been placed on our people during two of the years of the Hoover administration, and, try as hard as we may to reduce these appropriations, we find some gentlemen offering amendments to raise them. It seems to me it is time in conscience that you join with us in uniting to lower the cost of our Federal Government instead of increasing it. Our Government can again be operated upon an annual Budget of two and one-half or three billion dollars, and the sooner we so reduce it the sooner will return prosperity. City and State governments and business establishments are reducing their costs of operation. The Federal Government must further reduce its. This is no time for increasing appropriations and expenditures, and I hope the House will not agree to amendments for further increases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction, maintenance, operation, and repair of bridges, including $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for replacement of the fender pile system of the Highway Bridge, and including maintenance of nonpassenger-carrying motor vehicles, $87,500;

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLADAY: On page 19, line 24, strike out "$87,500" and insert "$122,500."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is of a different nature than the one just discussed. In the bill $87,500 is provided for this item, of which $45,000 is to be used in the replacement of the fender-pile system on the Highway Bridge. When funds are limited under a restriction of that kind, they can not be expended for any other purpose. That leaves $42,500 for the repair and maintenance of all bridges in the District, which number 189. Of that $42,500, $25,000 must be expended to operate drawbridges under Government regulations. That is the requirement of the Government and is a fixed charge. So that it only leaves $17,500 for the repair and maintenance of the 189 bridges in the District.

Usually we have expended from $75,000 to $100,000 for that purpose. I do not believe that the 189 bridges can be maintained and kept in repair for $17,500. It is possible that when this cut was made they did not have in mind the fact that $25,000 of the $42,000 must be expended for operating the drawbridges.

The amendment I have offered adds $35,000, which will provide fifty or fifty-five thousand dollars for the maintenance and repair of bridges, which is a little over half of what has been expended annually in the years gone by.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] would have increased one item $100,000. We defeated that. This amendment of his, if adopted, would increase this item $35,000. We must defeat it.

I am one of those who have been hopeful that after normalcy has returned, possibly in the next election, our friend from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] might be returned here in some way, because he is a valuable man, or has been. He has fixed it so that there is no chance on God's earth for him to ever come back, because if some fellow down in Illinois should get hold of to-day's RECORD and show these various amendments of his to increase items in this bill, the Illinois people would never vote to return the gentleman here.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] speaks of bridges, and I want the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] to hear this. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] speaks about money coming out of the Federal Treasury. I want the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to hear me. I want the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] and the gentlemen from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] to tell their constituents when they go home just how much of their money has been spent for the handsome bridges in Washington.

The Million Dollar Bridge over on Connecticut Avenue cost $1,000,000, and half of every dollar of it came out of the Federal Treasury. The other bridge that leads across and enters into Connecticut Avenue, carrying the street cars, cost a fabulous sum, and half of the expense of that bridge came out of the Public Treasury of the United States.

The Tiger Bridge, over on Sixteenth Street, one-half of every dollar that went into that bridge came out of the peoples' Treasury. The Francis Scott Key Bridge, which cost nearly $3,000,000, which the people in Washington use nearly every day, and which the constituents from Virginia of our new Walton Moore use every day, every dollar of that money came out of the Public Treasury of the United States. The big Arlington Bridge, which the gentleman from Massachusetts had much to do with building—$15,000,000 have been spent on that bridge, and every dollar of it came out of the Public Treasury of the United States, for which the taxpayers back home had to dig up and furnish the money. That is why the people back home are sending us letters and telling us they are tired of the way Congress has been transacting business, General MARTIN, and they want you to help us stop it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. MARTIN of Oregon rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I was talking the language of the gentleman from Oregon. I wish to yield to him first.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. If you want to cripple our Republican friends, that is all right; but do not cripple us Democrats; leave us alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am trying to cripple waste and extravagance and unnecessary appropriations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the gentleman to yield just to let the RECORD show that the bridges to which he refers were built before I was ever a Member of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Two of them were not; the Francis Scott Key $3,000,000 bridge was not. It is a new bridge.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not in my time.

Mr. BLANTON. And the $15,000,000 bridge was not. The gentleman helped build these bridges.

Mr. SIMMONS. No. Let me say to the gentleman I voted against and was one of those who spoke against the bridge bills on the floor of the House. Let us keep the RECORD straight in view of the gentleman's knowledge of the facts.

Mr. BLANTON. I imagine from his performances here on these items that if we were voting for them now——

Mr. SIMMONS. I would do exactly the same thing.

Mr. BLANTON. That if the question were now up for consideration he would vote for every one of them, for to-day and recently he has completely turned turtle. He used to be an economist. I used to follow him; but I am not going to follow him any longer, for he has ceased to be an economist and has joined the spenders here, and I will not follow a spender.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, to the thoughtful members of the committee let me say these reductions were not made by chance or caprice. There was a logical reason for every reduction; and if you will permit me, I shall be glad to give you some of the reasons for this reduction. Practically every item of cost that enters into these projects has decreased in price in the last year from 25 per cent to 45 per cent. The materials required in construction work of this character can be bought in the open market anywhere at much below last year's quotations, and, unfortunate though it is, labor is also much lower than a year ago. And yet, notwithstanding the great decline in the price of everything which goes into such items, we gave them the same amount this year they received last year. We were more than generous.

I do not believe there is a man here who, were he going to build a house or contract for any other construction work, would expect to pay the prices he would have had to pay a year or two years ago. And when the contractor submitted his bid and you found it below what it would have cost you a year ago, I certainly do not believe you would have refused to accept the reduction and have insisted on paying last year's prices in order to keep labor employed.

Now, we ought to manage the Government's business as we manage our own business. We should accept the advantages of lower prices for the Government just as we would accept them for ourselves.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Of course, I realize the situation confronting the gentleman in reference to reduction in the cost of materials, but I know the gentleman from Missouri and the people of the District of Columbia do not want contractors to pay laborers working on the streets of the District of Columbia 15 cents or 20 cents an hour.

Mr. CANNON. No; I object to it absolutely. I have fought ever since I have been a Member of the House for high wages, and if there were any way to make the amendment effective I would be glad to help to do it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am going to offer an amendment in a few minutes in the interest of labor and I hope the gentleman will support it.

Mr. CANNON. And I hope the gentleman from Missouri will couple with his amendment a provision that no farmer out in Missouri be allowed to hire a man for less than $3 a day. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Good!

Mr. CANNON. Men are working out there on the farms to-day for their board, working from before sunrise until after sunset. They would be glad to get 15 cents an hour. I have had men come to my farm and offer to work for me through the winter months for their board alone. I hope the gentleman will also take care of these when he drafts his amendment.

There is less unemployment in the District of Columbia than in any other city in the United States to-day. No factories are being shut down in the District of Columbia. No industrial plants have been closed. More buildings are going up and more construction is under way here in Washington than in any State in the Union. The Government service here has not discharged a single man. It is still paying salaries every month and those salaries will buy more than they ever bought before. And naturally there is less distress here and less occasion for distress than there is anywhere else that can be named.

And yet they come in here and ask the taxpayers of St. Louis and of every other city—cities every one of which have far worse problems of unemployment and distress than Washington ever dreamed of having—to help take care of the unemployed of Washington. What is it that sets the unemployed of Washington apart that the citizens of my city and your city should neglect its own unemployed to take care of Washington's unemployed? I have every sympathy for Washington's unemployed. I want to do everything I can to alleviate their situation, but we should give some consideration to the taxpayers of other cities whose unemployment problems are vastly worse than Washington's.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not this the trouble, that anyone who will speak for the increase of an appropriation affecting the District can get his picture on the front page of the Washington papers and favorable editorial mention, but anyone who speaks of votes against it is regularly cursed in the Washington papers?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have no objection to Members getting invitations to dinners and smokers and oyster roasts and being entertained as guests of honor at local meetings and featured in the press, but we owe it to the taxpayers, both of the District and of the country at large, to carefully scrutinize these expenditures and reduce them whenever it can be done without impairing the service.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For current work of repairs to streets, avenues, roads, and alleys, including the reconditioning of existing gravel streets and roads, and including the purchase, exchange, maintenance, and operation of nonpassenger-carrying motor vehicles used in this work, $750,000: Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, should they deem such action to be to the advantage of the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized to purchase a municipal asphalt plant at a cost not to exceed $30,000.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the proviso. I will reserve it for a minute. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on page 22, in lines 7 to 15, he is inserting in this bill an extra four years' guaranty by the builders of roads beyond the one year in the existing law; and, in my judgment, that extra period of guaranty may increase the cost of road building.

I assume that is why the gentleman has put in this proviso over here, to use as a threat to the road contractors that the District commissioners may be authorized to build an asphalt plant. It seems to me that combining the two is quite unfair to the contractor.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that this was put in for the purpose of securing economy in street contracts. It was found that when these contracts were advertised, the contractors sometimes got together at a dinner the night before. The next morning when bids were opened it was discovered that, by a remarkable coincidence, everybody bid the same price except one man, who bid a little bit more and got the contract. The next contract went to another man. And the next to another. And so on around. Always at high prices and the city holding the sack.

So in order to protect the city against these benevolent gentlemen, this item was put in the bill permitting the Government to make its own asphalt. There is no likelihood that it will ever take advantage of the option and this is merely a precaution against collusive bidding.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman tell us why he increased the existing law and guaranteed these contracts over a period of four years?

Mr. CANNON. We found you may secure asphalt of several grades. One grade will last a year. Another grade will wear five years. We prefer to have the latter.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman assure the House that the city will always get it?

Mr. CANNON. That is the purpose of this provision.

Mr. GOSS. But you also say in the same breath that you intend to and you are not going to.

Mr. CANNON. It is merely the shotgun behind the door. The fact that the gun is known to be there obviates the necessity of using it. As long as they know we are prepared to make asphalt they provide it at a reasonable cost.

Mr. GOSS. I have talked to the gentleman about it; and if he will assure us that he will go into this fully next year, I will withdraw my reservation.

Mr. CANNON. I see the gentleman's point of view. If he will take it up next year, I am certain the committee will be delighted to go over it with him at length.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's statement, I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] on withdrawing the point of order. Nearly every municipality has had experience with the so-called Asphalt Trust referred to by the gentleman from Missouri.

Many municipalities, including my home city, have been forced, in order to meet the conditions brought about by this Asphalt Trust, to establish a minor municipal asphalt factory, largely to take care of repairs.

I also approve of the item in the bill which extends the guaranty from one year to five years, because the life of a good asphalt pavement is usually five years. There are various kinds of asphalt pavements, as the gentleman knows, and the asphalt that is laid here in the District of Columbia is in accordance with specifications made out by the District of Columbia Commissioners and also in conformance to the standard laid down by the Bureau of Standards. From my personal observation, I know very few cities where as superior an asphalt is laid as in the District of Columbia, but I think the District Commissioners should have some leeway by having authority to establish, perhaps, a municipal repair plant to keep the pavements in repair.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman feel he can conclude in five minutes?

Mr. FISH. Easily, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, yesterday a cowardly and dastardly attack was made upon the President elect, and the people of this country are greatly shocked but at the same time they rejoice that the protecting hand of Providence stood between the life of the President elect and the bullet of the would-be assassin.

I rise at the present time to call the attention of the Congress to the fact that there is certain legislation pending before the Congress that might have prevented this near tragedy. At the present time the Government of the United States is powerless. No department of the Government has had any authority since 1925 to even keep in contact with the anarchists and with the revolutionists and with those who would overthrow our Government by force and violence.

Mrs. ESLICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Gladly.

Mrs. ESLICK. Would the Eslick bill that was reported out of the Judiciary Committee this morning be of help at this time?

Mr. FISH. I will say to the lady that there is no other legislation before this body that would be so helpful in this particular instance. [Applause.] This is the kind of legislation that should be promptly enacted. That bill was introduced as a result of careful study by the distinguished Representative from Tennessee, after serving on a committee of investigation of this House for six months, investigating this very situation, and in good faith and sincerity and knowing the facts he introduced that piece of legislation that hitherto has been lying dormant in a committee of this House.

So far as the authority or powers of the Department of Justice are concerned, there is nothing at the present moment to prevent any assassin from shooting down the President or the President elect; and I appeal for the immediate consideration of the Eslick bill, which includes an investigation of both aliens and native born who advocate assassination of public officials.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I have only five minutes.

Mr. MANLOVE. I just want to call attention to the fact that in the new House Office Building two workingmen were employed there yesterday who could not even speak the English language.

Mr. FISH. I also want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we passed the Dies bill on June 6, 1932, by an overwhelming vote, and sent it over to the other body, where it was unanimously reported by the Senate Immigration Committee, providing for the deportation of aliens who advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence. Up to now no action has been taken upon that bill, because one Member will not give unanimous consent to the consideration of this important legislation which has been pending in the Senate of the United States and if permitted to be voted on would unquestionably pass by a tremendous majority.

I hope this near tragedy will call the attention of the Members of both Houses to the condition of utter impotence and powerlessness of the different departments of the Government even to investigate or keep in contact with the revolutionary activities of those who would destroy our republican form of government by force and violence.

There is only one group that is responsible for the fact that the Congress has not given this power to the various departments of the Government and that group is the Congress of the United States because of its failure to enact adequate legislation.

There are two measures pending, one affecting American citizens who advocate assassination and the overthrow of the Government, which is the Eslick bill reported by the Judiciary Committee to-day, and the other the Dies bill that applies to alien communists who urge the overthrow of the Government by force and violence, and both should be enacted into law without further delay. I say to you that the only thing that these alien communists fear is deportation. They do not fear the police, and they do not fear our courts or our jails. The only thing they fear is deportation back home. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman can conclude in three minutes?

Mr. SEGER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Chairman, I am not very familiar with the bill that was referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. I hope it goes further than providing for the deportation of undesirable aliens and anarchists. It is a disgrace the assassin who made an attempt on the life of the President elect last night is a citizen.

Wire stories have carried the report that the fiend was a member of an anarchist ring at Paterson, N. J., one of the cities in my district. I have checked with Chief Moran of the Secret Service, who says he has no information to substantiate such a report.

While it appears this man once lived in the vicinity of Paterson, it has been established he has not been there for many months, and I know I speak for the 140,000 loyal men and women living in that community when I say they are outraged by the deed and resentful of the fact that this man ever had any connection there.

The city of Paterson has given to the State and Nation some of its most illustrious characters. Its history closely follows that of our Nation. Its men and women have responded gloriously in every emergency. The city and its people should not be maligned because of the actions of such a fiend. With me and with you the people of Paterson and my district are prayerful to-day Mr. Roosevelt's life was spared, they are sorrowed over the toll that was taken, and they demand speedy justice. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used for the operation of a testing laboratory of the highway department for making tests of materials in connection with any activity of the District government.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 16, strike out all of lines 16, 17, 18, and 19.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment may be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, the lines stricken out are lines which provide for the closing of the laboratory of the highway department. During the last year the highway department, outside of its own work, made 543 tests for the bridge department, 388 for the building inspector, 782 for the municipal architect, and inspections for the city refuse, the purchasing office, the repair shop, the sanitary engineer, the water department, and thousands of tests for the highway department. The tests for the fiscal year 1932 were 112,000 yards of concrete, 510,000 barrels of cement, 197,000 tons of sand, 329,000 tons of gravel, nad 88,000 tons of bituminous mixture.

We have a plant and apparatus costing $100,000. In addition to that, the Treasury Department has had tests conducted and have paid from Government funds $10,122 in 1932, and up to date they have paid $9,632 in 1933.

It is proposed this year to conduct the tests with three men out in the field, and have the tests made by the Bureau of Standards.

We will save by the closing of this laboratory the salaries of the three men—one drawing $1,260, another $1,500 or $1,600, and one $2,000.

I believe it is a serious mistake to do away or in any way to hinder the testing of materials that are going into the streets and public buildings of the District. If this is done the Bureau of Standards will conduct all the Government tests, and it will be increasing the burden—as the gentleman from Texas refers to it—it will be a burden taken from the people of the District and placed upon the people throughout the United States.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Bureau of Standards has the personnel and the equipment and they do the work of this laboratory there would be no additional cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes; because the District is paying for the District of Columbia laboratory. It would shift the cost from the District onto the Federal Government.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not understand how it would shift the cost if the Bureau of Standards already has the personnel to do the work, if it is paying their salaries now, and if they have the equipment to do the work, which is all paid for.

Mr. HOLADAY. The District laboratory is paid for by the District of Columbia. The Bureau of Standards is paid for by the Government. If we take the testing of these materials out of this laboratory and close it, and shift the testing of it over to the Bureau of Standards, we shift the burden from the District to the general expenses of the Government. The bureau is equipped to do this work, but they will need additional personnel.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But they claim they will not.

Mr. HOLADAY. They do not say that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. My understanding is, from the hearings and from what the chairman says, that they will not.

Mr. HOLADAY. They say they can do the work, but that they will need additional personnel.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. For over 15 years the Government of the United States and the government of the District of Columbia, working separately and together, have been testing materials and formulas for road construction and street paving to find the best method and the best materials to be used. They have finally found them. Practically all of that expense is behind us. Practically the only testing that is going on now and for the future is on the material that goes into the construction, to determine whether it comes up to standard. As my friend from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has told you, the Bureau of Standards has the equipment and the men to do that work, and they have told him they could do it without any expense.

Mr. HOLADAY. They have not made that statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Just a minute. The gentleman does not know. He is too impulsive. The chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. CANNON] will back me up, that they have told him that.

Mr. CANNON. The head of the Bureau of Standards told me that he would be glad to do it without any expense to the District.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield, and I shall not put any unauthorized interruptions of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] in my remarks. I shall cut it out. Mr. Chairman, I want to tell you a secret. During all of the hearings on this bill, during all of the consideration, you will not find one word from my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] against this item. Not once in the committee did he ever rise and move to change one word of this item. Why did he not do it then and save you gentlemen all this time on this floor? Why did he not get up and propose his amendment in the committee and see if he could not put it across? What has come over him since the committee has reported the bill to the full committee? What has come over him all of a sudden that he changes his modus operandi on these bills, because he has been trying to save in the past? Why should he all of a sudden jump the other way? He has a stack of amendments there almost a foot high to offer to this bill, to add various increases, and you Republicans ought to stop it. You ought to let him stand up and vote by himself every time he offers an amendment to increase items $100,000 at a time. It is ridiculous for him to propose these amendments, for he can not put them across. He is not going to get the membership to back him up here in adding these large amounts of money to this bill, when the people of the United States are against it, and want economy. If he were to get an amendment approved here, it would embarrass you Republicans, and I will tell you why: The chairman of the subcommittee has told you that if you add a single amendment to this bill increasing the appropriations he is going to ask for a separate vote upon it in the House, and he is going to put you on record on your yea-and-nay vote as to whether or not you are in favor of increasing the expenses in this time of depression, and I imagine that some of you boys who have been going through the tellers in favor of these ridiculous amendments will either be at home or in your offices, or you will change front and vote the other way when it comes to increasing appropriations on a record vote.

Mr. MAY. Did the gentleman say there was going to be a surplus in the District treasury after this bill passes?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, let us not get away from what we are trying to do, and that is to keep the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] from doing something that he never has done before during his long tenure of office here—that is, trying to increase appropriations. We are trying to stop him from injuring himself and to preserve his hitherto good record. We are trying to keep him from ruining himself and his whole future politically.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to add to the remarks made by our colleague [Mr. FISH] a few moments ago, a prediction which I believe the Members of the House will have an opportunity to see come true. I was a member of the committee appointed to investigate the communists' activities in this country, of which the gentleman from New York was chairman, and I predict that there will be two organizations in this country rally to the defense of the man who committed the distressing crime in attempting to take the life of President-elect Roosevelt last evening in Miami. One is the International Labor Defense, which is a communist organization; and, if the American Civil Liberties Union plays true to form, it will also come to the defense of this man.

I hope the Members of this House will get together now before it is too late and get behind the Eslick bill making it a crime for anyone to advocate the overthrow of the Government by force or violence, which was reported out of the Committee on the Judiciary this morning, and enact it into law before this session of Congress comes to a close. The country needs the protection provided in that bill. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 22, after line 19, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"No appropriation contained in this act shall be available for the payment for personal services, either by direct employment or under contract, at a rate of compensation which is less than 35 cents per hour."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, one of the unhappy duties that come to a Member of Congress is to legislate for a great city when that city has no representation in the Congress. In legislating for the District of Columbia I am going to proceed exactly as I would if I were a member of a legislative body in my own city.

I know the people of my city do not want anyone to work at hard labor on the streets, repairing or making new streets in any city, for less than 35 cents an hour. A practice has grown up in the District of Columbia whereby outside contractors have been underbidding responsible local contractors, and they bring in by truckload their own labor, which they pay 15 or 20 cents an hour, thereby depriving citizens of the District of Columbia of work and making them objects of charity and requiring this body to appropriate large sums of money for relief. I think if my amendment were adopted, so that they would be required to pay the laboring man a reasonable wage—35 cents an hour—there would be work here for a great many men who to-day find themselves in the position of asking help from the charitable organizations of the District.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman approve of the decision of the Treasury Department requiring this Government, out of the people's Treasury, to pay carpenters $11 a day and to pay plasterers $14 a day and to pay bricklayers $14 a day, when back in Missouri they are glad to get three or four or five dollars a day?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about. Laboring men in Missouri get as high wages as they do any place in the country, and before the depression carpenters got $15 a day; plasterers got $16 a day; plumbers got $16 a day; painters got $12 a day.

Mr. BLANTON. They tell me thousands of artisans in St. Louis and Kansas City are without jobs to-day.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I know they are without jobs, and I will vote for any legislation to provide jobs for them. Put men back to work—that will end the depression. I would give everyone of them a job if I could; but I am speaking for the poor man in the District of Columbia now who is willing to work, and whose work is taken away from him by men living outside the District, because the man living outside the District is willing to work for 20 cents an hour, and in some instances for 15 cents an hour. Would you deny a man 35 cents an hour for hard labor? I hope we have not reached that stage.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill. I am thinking of the people in the 48 States and not merely in the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PRALL). The gentleman from Missouri concedes the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, may I be recognized to propound a unanimous-consent request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the request.

Mr. HOLADAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] may have the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the letter he received from the Bureau of Standards with reference to the question of the District testing laboratory, if the gentleman desires to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman evidently has not been listening. At least he does not seem to have heard the statement I have already made during this debate relative to my conversation with the office of the Bureau of Standards. I have already explained that Doctor Briggs, Director of the Bureau of Standards, told me over the telephone, and I repeat it again, that, while not soliciting the work, the bureau would do it if requested, and that it would be done necessarily without cost to the District. I have never at any time mentioned any letter, either written or received. My conversation was direct with Doctor Briggs himself.

The Clerk read as follows:

For widening to 73 feet and repaving the roadway of Constitution Avenue NW., North Capitol Street to First Street, and for widening to 80 feet and repaving the roadway of Constitution Avenue NW., First Street to Second Street, and for widening to 80 feet and repaving the roadway of Constitution Avenue NW., Pennsylvania Avenue to Sixth Street in accordance with plans therefor to be jointly approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, including the necessary reconstruction, relocation, changes, and adjustments of all water mains, sewers, and for storm water sewer in Constitution Avenue, Sixth Street to Tenth Street (at a cost not to exceed $30,000), in advance of paving, trees, sidewalks, lamp-posts, fire hydrants or other structures affected, and including personal services and all necessary incidental expenses, at a total cost not to exceed $138,000, of which sum $94,800 is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available, and not to exceed $43,200 shall be transferred from and in accordance with the appropriation in the independent offices appropriation act, 1934, for the construction of the Arlington Memorial Bridge.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

At the last session, when the independent offices appropriation act was under consideration, I endeavored to gain information from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], having charge of the bill, as to the allocation of expense for the paving of Constitution Avenue through the Mall. When the bill was under consideration at this session of the Congress I inquired whether the gentleman had any idea whether it was the purpose of the District commissioners or any other activity of the Government to complete and improve the highway—Constitution Avenue from Fourth Street west. The gentleman from Virginia was unable to give me that information. We have the item here providing for the resurfacing and improvement of Constitution Avenue in certain parts. Will the gentleman acquaint the House as to whether this completes the improvement from Fourth Street down to the Memorial Bridge, or what is the plan as to the extent of the improvement?

Mr. CANNON. There are two classifications of paving areas on the avenue. First, that bounded exclusively by abutting Government property. In such instances the Government pays 70 per cent and the District pays 30 per cent. Where District property abuts on the avenue, the Government pays 40 per cent and the District 60 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does this proposed appropriation complete the work of widening and paving Constitution Avenue from where it has now been improved at Fourth Street west to the approach of the Memorial Bridge?

Mr. CANNON. It is the understanding of the committee that it will require two more years to complete the avenue. It will be one of the great avenues, not only of the city, but of the world.

Mr. STAFFORD. As all of us know, during the recess they widened Constitution Avenue from Fourth Street east. At present, for a square or two squares, there is no thoroughfare at all, and farther west the roadway is in a very bad condition.

What is proposed? Is it proposed now to complete the new pavement from where it has been completed at Fourth Street to the Memorial Bridge, or how far? For my part, I think we should appropriate the money to improve this highway now that we have launched upon it.

Mr. CANNON. The appropriation provided in this bill carries out the program for the current year. It will be two years more, however, before the work is completed, and appropriations for that purpose will be carried in the supply bills reported in 1934 and 1935. That will complete construction in the fiscal year of 1936.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what extent does the appropriation here carried complete the work? I am interested in this because nearly every evening I walk down Constitution Avenue on my way to the hotel. What section of the highway will be completed out of this appropriation? What is the program?

Mr. CANNON. The work authorized in this bill is in two sections—one section from Second Street to Pennsylvania Avenue and the second section from Third Street to Sixth Street. When these two sections are in, the avenue will have been completed from North Capitol to Sixth Street. The remaining portion of the Avenue from Sixth Street to Memorial Bridge will be constructed in 1935 and 1936.

Mr. STAFFORD. We all know that during the past summer recess the portion from First Street to Fourth Street has been completed.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Calvert Street Bridge over Rock Creek: For construction of a bridge to replace the Calvert Street Bridge over Rock Creek, including necessary changes in water and sewer mains, and including the employment of engineering or other professional services, by contract or otherwise, without reference to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), or the classification act of 1923, as amended, and engineering and incidental expenses, $500,000, and the commissioners are authorized to enter into contract or contracts for construction of said bridge at a cost not to exceed $750,000: Provided, That any street railway company using said bridge shall install thereon at its own expense an approved underground system of street-car propulsion and at its own expense shall thereafter maintain such underground construction, and bear the cost of surfacing and resurfacing and maintaining in good condition the space between the railway tracks and 2 feet exterior thereto as provided by law, and shall defray the cost of excess construction occasioned by such use including the relocation and construction of closed plow pits at the west approach to the bridge in accordance with plans to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I refer particularly to the statement in lines 5 and 6 of page 24, "by contract or otherwise, without reference to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, or the classification act of 1923, as amended."

Why is it necessary to make this exemption, and what are these sections? Would this give the commissioners the right to contract without advertising for bids, for instance?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. GOSS. In other words, the commissioners can enter into a contract with anyone they wish without advertising for bids.

Mr. CANNON. Exactly.

Mr. GOSS. So the contract would not go to the lowest bidder in that instance.

Mr. CANNON. It is resorted to, as the gentleman doubtless knows, only in exceptional cases where it is necessary to secure men specializing in branches of engineering not ordinarily handled by the District staff.

Mr. GOSS. They are also exempted from the classification act which pertains to wages paid.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; such men can not be provided for under the civil service.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that. What are the extenuating circumstances in this instance that would warrant waiving the provisions of the classification act, and the awarding of a contract after advertising for bids to the lowest bidder?

Mr. HOLADAY. If the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me, I will answer the question of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOLADAY. It is the purpose, under this provision, to permit the employment of expert bridge engineers. They have been employed and the work is practically completed.

Mr. GOSS. Now, already?

Mr. HOLADAY. Already.

Mr. GOSS. So that we have given a contract without advertising for bids?

Mr. HOLADAY. Oh, no, no; not on the bridge; simply for employing the engineers to draw the plans. The plans have been drawn and I am informed that within 30 days they will be ready to submit for bids. This language does not apply to the construction of the bridge.

Mr. GOSS. That is my point. The paragraph starts off: "For the construction of a bridge to replace the Calvert Street Bridge," and then makes these exemptions with reference to the classification act and advertising for bids.

Mr. HOLADAY. The intention is that it shall apply only to engineers to draw plans. This is a bridge almost 800 feet long and the District does not have in its employ an engineer capable of drawing, or qualified to draw, plans for a bridge of this size.

Mr. GOSS. And the gentleman can assure the committee the bridge will not be built without advertising for bids and outside the provisions of the classification act?

Mr. HOLADAY. Oh, absolutely; there is no question about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will notice there is express authorization carried in lines 9, 10, and 11 to have this bridge constructed by contract.

Mr. GOSS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. I agree with the gentleman that the forepart of the paragraph is rather awkwardly drawn. It might convey the impression that it was the purpose to construct this bridge without bids.

Mr. GOSS. Absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the reference to section 3709 is the customary reference to exempt skilled employees from civil-service requirements. It is merely awkwardly expressed.

Mr. GOSS. I have no objection to the engineers being without the act, but I do not want the bridge to be built without advertising for bids.

Mr. STAFFORD. The sole purpose of the paragraph is to permit the employment of skilled engineers without reference to the provisions referred to.

Mr. CANNON. I may say to the gentleman from Connecticut that this language is similar to that which has been carried for many years. The District has on its engineering staff men capable of handling all ordinary architectural problems, but the building of bridges of this character is a highly specialized branch of engineering.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not make the point of order, but I think the language might be cleared up. It is awkwardly drawn. The intent of Congress is to have the exemption apply only so far as the engineering talent is concerned in the designing of the bridge.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; because the regular staff is under civil service. It is necessary to go outside of the civil service to secure specialists. It is a provision which has been carried for many years.

Mr. GOSS. I do not want it to apply in such a way as to obviate advertising for bids for the construction of the bridge provided for in lines 9, 10, and 11, on page 24.

Mr. CANNON. It does not apply to that portion.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the commissioners to carry out the provisions of existing law governing the collection and disposal of garbage, dead animals, night soil, and miscellaneous refuse and ashes in the District of Columbia, including inspection; fencing of public and private property designated by the commissioners as public dumps; and incidental expenses, $840,000, including not to exceed $14,000 for repair and improvement of the garbage-reduction plant: Provided, That any proceeds received from the disposal of city refuse or garbage shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in the manner provided by law: Provided further, That this appropriation shall not be available for collecting ashes or miscellaneous refuse from hotels and places of business or from apartment houses of four or more apartments in which the landlord furnishes heat to tenants.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

A comparison of the figures stated in the report shows the committee has made a rather drastic cut of $185,000 in the estimate made by the Budget for the disposal of refuse. Also, in the prior item for removal of snow the Budget estimate is cut $85,000.

It is generally conceded that the removal of snow such as we have had recently means the giving of employment, instead of passing out a dole, to a large number of the destitute.

May I inquire of the gentleman the justification of the committee in making such radical cuts? For instance, with reference to the removal of snow, more snow has fallen this past season than I have known for many years during my service here. The gentleman has cut that $85,000 and has cut the item for the disposal of refuse $185,000. What is the justification for these decisive cuts?

Mr. CANNON. I may say to the gentleman we considered this ample provision. To illustrate, in the year 1923——

Mr. STAFFORD. 1923?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I am going back to show how this item has been increased. In 1923, we did this work for $385,000. There has been no change in the climate, and our equipment to-day is much more effective, and yet we are this year appropriating for the same work $400,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman realizes that we now have better facilities and machinery for removing snow than we have ever had before. It has revolutionized that work. These snow plows can go down a street and in a few minutes clear the street. We did not have them when the Knickerbocker Theater caved in. We had more snow in the year when the Knickerbocker Theater caved in than we have had since.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall have to dissent from the statement of the illuminating gentleman from Texas. I have observed when I have traveled around the country that certain municipalities really have improved machinery, but we do not have it here. However, that does not account for what I am seeking to ascertain; why the Budget estimate for the removal of snow has been cut $85,000 and the item for the disposal of refuse has been cut $185,000? Rather drastic cuts.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman understands that everything that goes into this item in the way of machinery, automobiles, and other equipment has been materially cut.

Mr. STAFFORD. What has been cut?

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman should also take into consideration the fact that we have taken out the furlough.

Mr. STAFFORD. But even if the furlough is taken out, that does not dispose of the question that the snow and the refuse has to be hauled out. What is the logic of the gentleman's mathematics?

Mr. CANNON. We are appropriating $400,000 here, which is in addition to the furlough, to do precisely the same work we formerly did with less efficient equipment for $385,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Last year you appropriated $550,000. The Budget recommended $485,000 and you are cutting the Budget estimate $85,000. Last year for the removal of refuse you appropriated $1,000,000, and the Budget recommended $1,125,000. You recommend this year $840,000, or $180,000 less. I think your cuts are drastic, and you have only the rapid ground of new scientific machinery and the furlough, when there has been no scientific machinery in either case installed here in the last four or five years.

Mr. CANNON. The furlough alone amounts to $40,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Everything is cheaper now, including his famous beer by Christmas.

Mr. STAFFORD. We will have cheap beer, but not with the gentleman's support, but with the support of the liberals of this House.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the funds appropriated in this act shall be available for the operation of high-temperature incinerators for the disposal of combustible refuse.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Virginia: Page 27, line 16, strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is merely what it purports to be, an amendment striking out the prohibition in the bill against using the incinerators which have recently been erected in the city of Washington.

As I understand the facts about this matter, they are that through appropriations made by Congress and under a policy adopted by Congress in making such appropriations, these incinerators for burning trash in the District were constructed at a cost of approximately $800,000. They were completed just last year.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will permit, the total cost was $674,122.84.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I thank the gentleman for the correction. It is very near $700,000.

The object of the amendment is that this $700,000 worth of equipment, which has been constructed under a policy of this Congress in order to dispose of the refuse of this city in a modern and proper way, may be continued. The bill, as it is now, provides that these incinerators may not be used.

The hearings disclose that it would cost somewhat more to operate these incinerators than to merely throw the trash out in a swamp. However, I imagine that when Congress appropriated for these incinerators and at the time they were erected, Congress, as well as everybody else, knew that it would cost more to haul this material to the incinerators and burn it up and haul the ashes away than it would to haul the refuse and dump it in a swamp. The Congress conceived that this was a good thing to do.

It is true we might be able to economize to-day by saying we will do away with all the sewers in the District of Columbia and we would perhaps save in dollars and cents; but the point I make is that Congress having established this policy and having erected these incinerators within the past year at this great expense, I think you will agree with me that at least the District Commissioners should have the right and the discretion to continue the use of the incinerators which they have erected at such great expense.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Could the gentleman give us an approximate idea of the cost of the use of the incinerators as compared with the other system of disposal?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. My recollection of the hearings is that those figures are not given, but it is said there that it will cost more. How much more the chairman of the committee may be able to tell the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. It costs more for the operation of the incinerators or for the disposal of the refuse on the lands?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. It will cost more to use the incinerators and burn the trash up and haul the ashes away than it would to merely haul it and dump it in a swamp.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know how much it costs now per year to run these incinerators?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I do not know how much it costs, but I know that the Congress appropriated over $700,000 to build these incinerators.

Mr. BLANTON. It now costs $200,000 per year to run them. Does the gentleman know how this refuse is going to be disposed of under this bill and how much we will save annually under this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes; you are going to take it over to Anacostia and throw it in a swamp over there, so the hearings show.

Mr. BLANTON. We will save all together about $225,000 per year. Does the gentleman know the necessity for this dumping on the Anacostia Flats?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. No.

Mr. BLANTON. It will save much expensive dredging. Does the gentleman know the interest of the Government that will be served by doing this?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I suppose you will reclaim some land by doing this.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; and of great value to the Government. Inasmuch as the gentleman does not know how much it is going to cost to run these incinerators, does he know how much it is going to cost to do this work under the proposed plan?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The hearings do not disclose that.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman should find out about all these things before he begins to speak against such a provision in a bill.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman has been here a long time, and perhaps can give me some information that will be very useful in the future, and that is, How can I find it out if it is not in the hearings?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

It is estimated it will cost $200,000 a year to operate these incinerators. I believe this figure might be reduced to some extent, but there is no question but what it will cost more to use the incinerators than it will to haul the refuse out to the new arboretum and dump it there. It is estimated the saving will be from $75,000 to $125,000. As near as I can estimate it, I am of the opinion it will be a saving of about $85,000.

Here is the whole picture. For a good many years the city was using an incinerator for part of the refuse and was burning the balance out on the Anacostia flats, within a few hundred yards of where it is proposed to burn it now. The Government served notice on the District that they wanted to improve this land under the Anacostia park system.

A year ago it was necessary for the District to leave that dump ground. They went to the airport and were dumping there. The old incinerator which they had been using burned down, and after very mature deliberation and examination, extending over two or three years, the Government erected two incinerators, one south of the Capitol and one over in Georgetown.

It is proposed to close these incinerators which were put in operation just a few months ago and haul all of the refuse from all over the District and dump it on what are known as the arboretum grounds.

I think when we come to the final showdown it will be found that the arboretum people and the War Department will not give their consent to that, although I understand they have written a letter to the chairman which may fairly be interpreted as saying that they have no objection.

The amount that we may save may run to $100,000. The main question here is whether or not we want to close up the incinerators and haul the refuse out to the arboretum and make that place a dumping ground for refuse.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that it will cost $200,000 a year to run those incinerators. The alternative proposal in the bill will cost $14,000, a saving of $180,000 or more, on that one item.

Mr. HOLADAY. The gentleman is not going to get away with any such wild statement. The $14,000 that he speaks of is what it will cost for the men at the dump ground to burn it, and does not include the hauling. The net saving will not be over $100,000.

Mr. BLANTON. No; all together the change will save about $200,000 annually. This is also for the purpose of reclaiming the Anacostia Flats and obviating the spending of a lot of money to dredge Anacostia River, so that it is really for a double purpose.

Mr. HOLADAY. If you want to turn the arboretum into a dump ground for refuse, the amendment should not prevail.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request. I do not know what the gentleman from Massachusetts may have to say, but I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] may proceed for five minutes, to be followed by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, that should be done after the chairman of the subcommittee gets through. I have no objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts proceeding for five minutes if I can have five minutes to follow him. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have five minutes and I have five minutes in reply.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Chair can only put one unanimous-consent request at a time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall object until the gentleman from Missouri gets through.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] have 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas have 5 minutes to follow him, and that I be permitted 5 minutes to close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, by chance more than through any other cause, the introduction of the bill for the arboretum was intrusted to my hands some years ago, and I have taken a warm interest in the matter ever since. It has been rough sledding. Through difficulties brought about by our restrictions in the matter of assessments as a measure of price, we have as yet been unable to acquire the land necessary for the full development of this project.

One of the considerations successfully advanced for the purchase of what is known as the Mount Hamilton tract was the fact that adjacent to it were the Anacostia Flats. It was the resulting possibility of studying and cultivating both trees that require dry soil, and trees and shrubs that may grow in a damp soil, which made this site peculiarly attractive. I gather that now it is contemplated to proceed with the filling of the Anacostia Flats by the use of refuse. That would be all right if the refuse were wholly capable of destruction by burning, but anyone familiar with the ordinary city dump knows that nowadays large quantities of metal are thrown into those dumps. I know one that, when at home, I pass practically every day, which is a graveyard for automobiles, as well as for the other ordinary refuse of a city. Manifestly trees and shrubs will not grow to advantage in a soil largely composed of material of that sort. I have been informed that the original expectation was that rubbish of this kind would be dumped at a level so far below what is to be the level of the parkway that there would be plenty of soil above; but now it is apprehended that this may not be the case, and that the soil itself may be ruined for scientific purposes.

It is true indeed that there may be savings of the type that have been suggested, but I know from the experience of my own city that it is also necessary to take into account the expenses entailed on the fire department by this method of burning. I should say that on an average of once a week throughout the year the fire department is called out in my own city to extinguish a fire in the dump. At the same time the smoke from the dump is exceedingly disturbing to and damages the value of adjacent property. So against the savings there are offsets that ought to be taken into account.

For this reason, if for no other, I should hope the amendment would prevail.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Have there been any experiments as to the utility of the heat generated by these incinerators? When I was in the city government of New York they had just commenced to experiment with that.

Mr. LUCE. There have been experiments in Boston of the same sort.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it feasible?

Mr. LUCE. I have gained the impression that they have not been as successful as was expected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Through lack of uniformity in the fuel?

Mr. LUCE. Very likely that is the cause. However, the incinerator method is certainly the most cleanly, and I think in the long run it is advantageous to the welfare of cities that have their refuse destroyed in that way. For these reasons I trust the amendment may prevail.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I join with the gentleman from Massachusetts in desiring to take every precaution to insure proper soil and proper setting for the trees of the arboretum. The arboretum is destined to become one of the notable institutions of the city. No pains should be spared to protect and encourage it, and I am glad to be able to allay any apprehensions the gentleman may entertain as to the effect of this legislation on its development.

I quote from a letter from Dr. William A. Taylor, one of the eminent scientists of the country, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry in the Department of Agriculture, which is charged with the administration of the arboretum:

> If a permanently compacted dump is afterwards covered with good soil, such as the fine silt of the Anacostia River and marshes, to the depth of at least 3 feet, after it is settled and compacted, the land will be suitable for the growing of such trees as are expected to be planted in this area.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. LUCE. I understood that to be the fact, but I understand that now the apprehension is that it will not be covered to a depth of 3 feet.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it will be so covered. There need be no anxiety about that. If we save $225,000 in one year by using this area we can certainly afford to cover it properly. We would follow implicitly the directions of the Department of Agriculture in applying the soil. As a matter of fact, we will be killing two birds with one stone. We will be saving the $215,000 on the incinerators and at the same time be reclaiming land which otherwise would have to be reclaimed by the Department of Agriculture at great expense. It is interesting to note in this connection that marshland which has had a subsoil application of this character of material properly compacted in the fill before the top soil is applied, is in much better condition for park or arboretum purposes than marshland in which the entire fill has been made from dredged river silt. We have a perfect example of this at Hoover Field. On one side of the Military Road is land reclaimed by the Government; and, now, under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, which was filled from the bottom with material dredged from the Potomac River. Although the fill was made some 17 years ago and has been cultivated annually, it still settles in pockets from time to time. But over on the other side of the road, in what is now Hoover Airport, the same character of marshland that was first filled with refuse which was burned—just as we propose to burn the same refuse at the Arboretum—and compacted with tractors. Then, the top soil was added, as directed in Doctor Taylor's letter, and Mr. Walter of the airport tells me that after three months all settling has ceased.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LUCE. Can the gentleman inform us about the possible assurance that it will not be filled above those 3 feet?

Mr. CANNON. Of course that will be attended to like any other duty devolving upon the city.

Now, let us turn to the matter in hand. If ever there was an example of bureaucracy gone mad, we have it here. They want $200,000 to run these incinerators and they want $32,500 to build roads around them. They want a total of $232,500 when they did the same work last year at Hoover Field for about $14,500. By the adoption of this amendment, if those figures are to be depended on, we are saving the Government this year alone, approximately $215,000, or certainly in the neighborhood of $200,000.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I much regret that my time is limited. In addition to that, the incinerators are not a success. They are defective. Let me read from a report that we have on them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair yield the gentleman from Missouri two minutes of the time I was to take?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. This is the report on these incinerators. After we had spent, as the gentleman says, nearly $700,000, they will not do what they were supposed to, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has just indicated. Here is the report:

> Faulty construction and design make it necessary to frequently let the fire go out in order to clean out the pit. The men in charge report them as insufficient to handle the amount of refuse in the District of Columbia. Now necessary to dump in open dumps. Fire must be maintained at a low level, as when draft is open paper is blown through the stacks out over the city.

But it is not necessary to secure a special report on them. If anyone will take the trouble to examine the ash from the incinerators as it is hauled to the dump at Anacostia and compare it with the ashes on the dumps at Hoover Airport, he will find that the material is burned no better in these so-called high-temperature incinerators than it is on the open dumps—and it will cost us something like $200,000 to run the refuse through the incinerators over what it will cost to burn in the open.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. HOLADAY. Who submitted that report?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman knows quite well that we are frequently not at liberty to give the source of information communicated to the committee. But I will say that the report is from a man of standing and entitled to credence.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. As a connoisseur of fine arts, our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] has not a peer in the Nation. On library matters the gentleman is an expert. In mapping out beautiful zones and Constitution Avenues we could not get along without him, and on all other matters theoretical he is a past grand master, but he does not have time to look into the practical side of things. This Holaday-Smith-Walton Moore-Illinois-Virginia amendment that would take this paragraph out of the bill will cost $225,000 if such amendment passes. The chairman of the subcommittee just said that a moment ago. In other words, if this amendment is passed, you will add a cost to the government of the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States of $225,000; but if you vote against the amendment and leave the bill as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has properly framed it, you will save $225,000. In addition to saving this almost $200,000 on closing up the incinerators, because it cost $200,000 to run them, and then the refuse is not burned any better than we are going to burn it—in addition to that, we will save a lot of dredging on the Anacostia. We will do the main primary filling of Anacostia Flats with this dumping and refuse burning, and then afterwards we will put this 3 feet of proper soil on top of that by dredging the Anacostia. Now, that meets the theoretical argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Everything will be esthetic there. Everything will be beautiful and lovely in the future. We will not hurt his keen sense of preserving the beautiful that he and all of us here in this city want, but we are going to save money also to the amount of $225,000. Now, the gentleman is a practical business man of Massachusetts. He has filled important positions in his State, and it ought to appeal to the gentleman when the bill is framed so that it will do everything he wants to do and still will save $225,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Board of Education is authorized to designate the months in which the 10 salary payments now required by law shall be made to teachers assigned to the work of instruction in nature study and school gardens.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What does this sentence mean?—

The Board of Education is authorized to designate the months in which the 10 salary payments now required by law shall be made.

Mr. CANNON. While principals and supervising officials are paid for 12 months, the teachers are paid only 10 months in the year. They are not paid for vacations. This provision gives the Board of Education authority to pay them and therefore to employ them at staggered periods in the year, so that all vacation periods will not occur simultaneously.

For example, a number of the teachers of elementary science in the elementary schools are required to take their vacations in the winter in order that they may be on duty and supervise garden activities during the summer months.

Mr. GOSS. Could that be construed so that they might be held up and then make it up a little later, or something of that sort. It does not read "consecutively."

Mr. CANNON. No. This merely designates the time they are to be paid.

Mr. GOSS. What is really intended is to have their checks mailed every month except two.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the months to be designated by the Board of Education.

Mr. GOSS. That leaves it in their discretion as to which two they will leave out.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. It in no way affects the amount of their compensation.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that, but the teachers may want to go on vacation; could not the mailing of the checks be arranged in such a way as to make it convenient for them? Have the desires of the teachers been recognized in this instance?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman knows that in the average business office all employees do not take vacations the same month, but at different times so as not to interrupt office work.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Had the gentleman watched here for many years, he would know that the desires of the teachers of Washington are never overlooked. That is one of the most powerful organizations here in Washington.

Mr. GOSS. I may say to the gentleman from Texas if that is the attitude of the committee, why not split it up into weekly payments?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman need not be uneasy that it is not according to the wishes of the teachers.

Mr. GOSS. I may say to the gentleman that many teachers in various places are uneasy as to where their pay is coming from.

Mr. BLANTON. There are no better-paid teachers anywhere in the United States than we have here in Washington; and the teachers of Washington are one set of teachers who have not had their pay stopped and who have not had their pay reduced during this depression.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations herein made for the public schools of the District of Columbia shall be used for the free instruction of pupils who dwell outside the District of Columbia: Provided, That this limitation shall not apply to pupils who are enrolled in the schools of the District of Columbia on the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GAMBRILL: Strike out the whole paragraph beginning with line 21, page 36, and ending with line 2 on page 37.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes of the time to be consumed by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, in case the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland fails I wish to offer an amendment. I would like to be heard on my amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we want some time to answer.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my original request by making the time 15 minutes.

Mr. GAMBRILL. May I say to the gentleman from Missouri that I have taken no part in the debate on this bill although two days were consumed in general debate, much of which did not touch the subject matter of the bill. I do not think my request unreasonable and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this House is not going to be held up in any such way.

I object to the request of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of no quorum?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Yes. I reserve it.

Mr. BLANTON. We will move a call of the House and get a quorum here.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to 15 minutes, the gentleman from Maryland to be recognized for 10 minutes and the gentleman from Texas for five minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Missouri can not parcel out time. The procedure is for the Chairman to recognize Members who stand in their places.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair is that the gentleman from Missouri may submit a unanimous-consent request to have debate limited to 15 minutes, the time to be allocated to the gentlemen as indicated.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] desires five minutes. I wish to modify my request by making the time 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the gentleman from Maryland desires to insist on his point of order.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn by the gentleman from Maryland.

The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes, that of this time 10 minutes be allotted to the gentleman from Maryland, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be allowed to proceed without interruption. This paragraph involves the welfare and education of 2,500 students from Maryland and Virginia, and it is a very important subject to the people of these States.

This paragraph in the District of Columbia appropriation bill, under the guise of a limitation, nullifies several acts of Congress, passed, it is to be assumed, after careful and mature consideration.

Let me disabuse the minds of the Members of this House of the idea that Maryland and Virginia are forcing pupils from those States into the schools of the District of Columbia to the exclusion of pupils residing in the District. You must bear in mind that the District of Columbia was originally a section 10 miles square, ceded to the Federal Government by Maryland and Virginia. The District of Columbia is surrounded on three sides by Maryland.

As the suburban developments within the District spread towards Maryland, they meet similar developments within that State, and these communities become one, although located in different political units.

The District of Columbia occupies a rather unique position in its relation to the contiguous territory of Maryland and Virginia, and that position can hardly be duplicated in any other section of the country. Maryland and Virginia have recognized this unique situation by extending the facilities of their schools to pupils from the District, who find it inconvenient to go to the District schools, or where these schools are inconveniently located in relation to their homes.

We in Maryland—and I shall let the Representatives from Virginia speak for that State—have sought, by the most liberal acts of cooperation, to meet the situation caused by our towns and communities overlapping towns and communities in the District, and vice versa. If this whole subject and all its interrelating phases could be taken up in a calm and deliberate way by the legislative committee of the District of Columbia, when consideration could be given to both sides of the problem as it affects the District and Maryland, we in Maryland would welcome such an investigation and inquiry. But a wrong will be done to the pupils from the District, Maryland, and Virginia if you attempt to meet the problem by the ipse dixit of a limitation in an appropriation bill, and that limitation inserted after ex parte hearings, confined to the public-school authorities of the District of Columbia, who give only one side of the case and by their ex parte statements create the impression the District schools are being overcrowded by Maryland and Virginia children, whereas not a scintilla of evidence is ever presented of the other side of the picture.

Let me say here—and without fear of successful contradiction—that we in Maryland are doing our share in the education of our youth. Let me also say—without fear of successful contradiction—that no State in the Union excels Maryland in its public schools, a fact which is recognized by educators generally.

Disabuse your minds, if you please, of the idea that all children residing in Maryland and Virginia are privileged to attend the schools of the District of Columbia free of tuition charges. Such is not the case. Let us see what the laws are; there are several which are pertinent. There is an act of Congress approved July 21, 1914, which provides that—

> Hereafter the taxes levied by the government of the District of Columbia and paid for the year next preceding the time of levying tutelage charges by nonresident pupils or the parents of nonresident pupils shall be accepted as a credit or part credit, as the case may be, on said tutelage.

Some pupils are admitted under this law, but of an inconsequential number.

Then there is the act of Congress approved March 3, 1915, that—

> Hereafter all pupils whose parents are employed officially or otherwise in the District of Columbia shall be admitted and taught free of charge in the schools of said District.

Most of the pupils from Maryland and Virginia are admitted under this act of Congress.

There are three other acts of Congress, which I will quote, but which are not very pertinent, in that the number of children admitted under these acts is small. The acts are as follows:

> The acts of Congress approved March 3, 1917, August 31, 1918, and July 11, 1919, provide that "the children of officers and men of the United States Army and Navy stationed outside of the District of Columbia shall be admitted to the public schools without payment of tuition."
>
> The act of Congress approved March 28, 1918, provides that "soldiers and sailors of the United States not residents of the District of Columbia who are on duty at stations adjacent to the District of Columbia shall be admitted for special instruction to the day schools and night schools of the District of Columbia without payment of tuition."
> The acts of Congress approved June 5, 1920, February 22, 1921, and June 29, 1922, provide that "the children of officers and men of the United States Army and Navy and children of other employees of the United States stationed outside of the District of Columbia shall be admitted to the public schools without payment of tuition."

Let us address ourselves to the act of March 3, 1915, under which 90 per cent or more of the Maryland and Virginia pupils attending the public schools of the District of Columbia are permitted to have tuition free of charge. Why did Congress say, in the act of March 3, 1915, that—

> Hereafter all pupils whose parents are employed officially, or otherwise, in the District of Columbia shall be admitted and taught free of charge in the schools of said District.

It was a recognition of the fact that a large number of Government employees whose salaries, if in the lower grades, are far from generous or bountiful, had taken up their residences in Maryland and Virginia to escape the higher cost of living in the District; and, as such employees of the Government, they are as much entitled to send their children to the public schools of the District of Columbia as are the Members of Congress, who draw $10,000 a year in salary, $5,000 for clerk hire, and $250 for postage. Members of Congress may send their children to the public schools of the District of Columbia free of tuition charges, and the proponents of this restriction in this legislation, which would change existing law, are willing to retain this right for themselves and their colleagues while denying the right to Government employees, many of whom receive small salaries.

It has been my observation in the past that the most vociferous proponents of this unfair and indefensible discrimination against Maryland and Virginia pupils have been those Congressmen who have educated and are educating their children in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and, in many instances, are without homes or property here and do not contribute one penny toward the taxes of the District.

The question may be asked, Why extend this privilege to the children of those employed "otherwise" in the District, as distinguished from those employed "officially"? The reason is obvious, as such persons, by their business connections and work, are contributing to the wealth of the District of Columbia and its assessable basis. But I shall want to approach this problem from the broadest and most comprehensible standpoint. I shall want to deal with the question in its relation to the unique problem of the territory of Maryland, thickly settled, which surrounds the District of Columbia on three sides; to speak of the system of cooperation and understanding which have existed on both sides, and which will continue unless ill-advised, improvident, and thoughtless legislation such as this becomes a law. Again I say Maryland is doing its part.

The hearings on the District of Columbia appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1934, pages 301–303, inclusive, give a recapitulation of the nonresident pupils attending the public schools of the District. I shall speak for the Maryland side of the question.

It shows that there are 1,720 pupils from Maryland attending the day schools of the District of Columbia, 175 in the vacation schools, and 55 in the night schools, or a total of 1,950.

From Virginia there are 613 pupils, and a few pupils from other States. The grand total of nonresident pupils attending the District of Columbia schools is 2,587, of which 66 pay tuition.

For the purpose of my discussion, I am going to take the 1,950 pupils from Maryland attending the schools of the District of Columbia.

Now let us see the other side of the picture: What is Maryland doing to accommodate nonresident pupils who are allowed to attend its schools free of charge, a large number being from the District of Columbia? I am going to take for my illustration three counties, adjacent to the District of Columbia—Prince Georges, Montgomery, and Anne Arundel—in the latter county being the Naval Academy and Fort George G. Meade.

I have a statement from the county superintendent of the schools of Prince Georges County to the effect there are attending the schools in that county 204 pupils, residents of the District, 40 pupils from the United States Government reservations or farms, and 52 from sundry States. The superintendent of the schools of Prince Georges County writes me as follows:

> Of the District of Columbia residents attending our schools, 73 are boarded in some Prince Georges family by some District of Columbia charitable organization, 31 are boarded in the county by their parents, 63 attend our schools because there is no District of Columbia school near their residence, and of the remainder a majority are living with some relative in the county.
> At our Bradbury Heights School we had to erect an additional classroom and employ an extra teacher for the 33 District of Columbia children attending. You may know that the part of Bradbury Heights in the District of Columbia has no school.
> No tuition is charged to any of these pupils, nor is any attempt made to bar them from our schools, although the cost of educating them, in proportion to our wealth, is not an inconsiderable item.

That county alone has expended in the past 10 years for the erection and enlargement of school buildings, all within a few miles of Washington, over $1,000,000.

In Montgomery County, adjacent to the District of Columbia, the number of pupils from the District attending the schools in that county is 47.

The superintendent of education for Anne Arundel County wrote me there were 360 pupils in the schools of that county who are the children of Navy and Army people living on Army and Navy reservations, and these pupils are furnished free tuition. Because of the crowded condition at Odenton, in Anne Arundel County, where 107 children living on the Fort George G. Meade reservation are educated free of tuition charges, the pupils of both the first and second grades have been put on half time. Yet with these conditions confronting us, we, in Maryland, are not complaining, as we are firm believers in the education of the young men and women of the country—it is their right to be educated and we have no desire to split hairs over who should pay for that education.

I am going to give you a more striking illustration of what we are doing, freely, willingly, and uncomplainingly. Seven miles out from Washington, on the Baltimore-Washington Boulevard, there is located at College Park the academic department of the University of Maryland. To this fine university and its law and medical schools, located in Baltimore, the State of Maryland annually appropriates over $2,000,000; about $284,000 comes from the Federal Government and about $1,183,000 from fees of students and miscellaneous sources. There is no duty on the part of the State of Maryland to receive students from the District of Columbia on the same basis as those from Maryland, but a recognition of the fact that the District of Columbia has no Federal or State-aided university induced the Maryland State authorities to throw the doors of the University of Maryland open to students from the District of Columbia.

In January, 1933, there were 628 students attending the university at College Park whose parents are residents of the District of Columbia. I might say, parenthetically, that not a few Members of Congress have sent their sons and daughters to this institution.

If we are to consider the financial aspect of this problem, which should be settled by legislation considered by a legislative committee, we find this striking situation so far as the University of Maryland is concerned: The average per capita cost per student at the University of Maryland is $497, the average tuition charge per student is approximately $157, or a difference in the red of $340, which, multiplied by 628 (the number of students from the District of Columbia attending the University of Maryland) means Maryland is contributing toward the education of these students $213,520 a year, to say nothing of any capital charges and construction expenditures for buildings to take care of these additional pupils.

In this connection it is to be borne in mind that Maryland receives no contribution from the Federal Government for the education of these students aside from the Federal grants which go to all agricultural colleges, whereas the Federal Government contributes many millions to the District of Columbia for its general expenses.

I have attempted no calculation of the cost to the counties of Prince Georges, Montgomery, and Anne Arundel to educate the pupils in their public schools who reside outside the counties, their number being about 651; but the cost must be considerable. And, taking all these pupils, I doubt if the parents of anyone are engaged in business in the State of Maryland. Of course, the State of Maryland could close its schools to the students whose parents reside in the District of Columbia or on Government reservations, if it were so minded, and this Congress could bar pupils from Maryland "whose parents are employed officially or otherwise in the District of Columbia." This would be an unsympathetic, harsh, and arbitrary way of settling a problem which requires tact, conciliation, and cooperation for its solution. For unless these traits are exhibited in its solution, the young men and women will be the ones to suffer.

I make one other assertion, which can not be successfully contradicted: No parent residing in Maryland would select a school in the District in preference to Maryland, other considerations being equal. I make this bold statement for the reason no State in the Union excels Maryland in its system of public schools, and I doubt if she has an equal.

The phenomenal progress of the Maryland public-school system during the past 10 years has been acknowledged throughout the entire country. The keynote of this progress has been equalization of educational opportunities and educational burdens throughout the State.

To summarize, you have 1,950 pupils in the public schools of the District of Columbia whose parents reside in Maryland. You have 1,279 pupils attending the public schools of Maryland whose parents reside here in the District of Columbia or on Government reservations or posts, and in this computation I have only taken into consideration the three counties of Maryland adjacent to the District. So you see the case is not one to be decided upon the ex parte statements of the public-school authorities of the District of Columbia. It is one for extensive and comprehensive study by a legislative committee when all the facts may be ascertained and proper legislation formulated. A limitation on an appropriation bill is no way to deal with such a complicated and interrelated problem; hence, I hope the limitation will be defeated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is an old fight that has been going on here in Washington since Maryland and Virginia ceded the 10 miles square for the District of Columbia. The Government has paid for every foot of this land many times.

My friend admits there are 2,500 children from Maryland and Virginia attending the schools of Washington free, and they have been attending them for many years without paying anything. They have been going to the graded schools, they have been going to the high schools, they have been going to the night schools, and they have been going to the business schools without paying for it, back to time to which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Their families do not pay one single dollar of taxes in the District of Columbia, either on their homes or their personal property. They do not pay any automobile tax, license tax, or anything else to the District of Columbia. They get their automobiles licensed over in Virginia or Maryland. They pay Virginia and Maryland the property tax on their automobiles. They pay a property tax on their homes and personal property to Virginia or Maryland and they get the schooling of their children in Washington free, and this limitation will not stop a single child who is now getting such tuition in Washington, because we can not legislate here. As far as we can go in this bill is to put on a limitation and provide that in the future no new ones shall come in free. This is all the limitation does.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks and put in a list of all the school children from Maryland and Virginia attending the schools here in order to show exactly how they fill up our Washington schools.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Is not the gentleman mistaken in his statement that this will not bar any children who are at the present time enrolled in the public schools? It will do that, will it not?

Mr. BLANTON. No; read the amendment. It does not bother them. We can not do that because we can not change the law in an appropriation bill. Any such provision would be subject to a point of order.

We are only trying to stop the very unjust situation here where people can live in two States—Virginia and Maryland—pay their taxes there in Virginia and Maryland, and get the schooling of their children free in the District of Columbia.

If you will turn over to the next two pages of this bill, you will see where we are spending for the next fiscal year $1,375,000 for new buildings here in Washington. Why? To help house free the school children coming here daily from Maryland and Virginia. If it were not for the 2,500 school children from the States of Maryland and Virginia, who come over here and get their schooling free every year, we would not have to spend this money and we would not have spent a tremendous sum of money for new buildings this year or during the last fiscal year.

I do not blame my friend from Maryland and I do not blame my friend from Virginia. They are representing their constituents. Walton Moore—and all of us loved him—and Charlie Linthicum—and we all loved him—and the other men from Maryland got more hand-outs here out of the Federal Treasury for their people in Maryland and Virginia in past years than has been spent in Texas out of Federal funds since it has been a State. They were continually getting hand-outs. You can not blame them. It is a part of the splendid service my friend from Maryland gives his people and that is what keeps him here. This is what sent my friend SMITH here, and this is what keeps PALMISANO here. They are always getting hand-outs.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PALMISANO. The gentleman realizes that the Government allowed the children of Maryland and Virginia to attend the schools here because of the fact that the Federal Government buildings are on ground that belonged to Maryland and Virginia originally.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me get the gentleman away from that idea. This Government has paid dearly for that long ago.

Mr. PALMISANO. And let me say further that the parents of the children in Maryland that go to school here spend all their money in Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. But they live in Virginia or Maryland and pay their taxes in those States. They commute back home in the evening and come back here the next morning.

The following is a correct list of the nonresident school children attending the public schools of Washington, to wit:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GAMBRILL) there were—ayes 11, noes 12.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I object to the vote and make the point of no quorum.

I withdraw the point and ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 2, strike out the period, insert a comma and the following: "Provided further, That the children of officers and men of the United States Army and Navy and the Marine Corps and the children of other employees of the United States stationed outside of the District of Columbia shall be admitted to public schools without payment of tuition."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill not authorized by law. It is not germane to the paragraph or to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am amazed at the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas. Mr. Chairman, the law on the subject is permanent legislation enacted by Congress in 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman the citation?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I have not, but it was the act of March 3, 1913, which is the permanent law on the subject.

Mr. CANNON. If it is now permanent law, why offer this amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Because you are proposing a limitation to change the law.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the committee has already voted on this limitation, and the gentleman's amendment would change or set aside the action of the committee voting a limitation into the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would overrule that point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. But the point of order that it is legislation and is not germane is good.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The permanent law is contained in the act of March, 1913. Since that time, from time to time the Appropriations Committee of the House has sought by limitation to restrict the permanent law on the subject. They call it a limitation, but when I seek to add something else it becomes legislation on an appropriation bill.

I do not think it makes much difference whether you call it a limitation or an exception under the Holman rule, or by any other name, but it smells like legislation on an appropriation bill, and it is legislation, in effect.

If there can be a limitation on an appropriation that children of such a class may come into the schools of Washington, it is going no farther to propose another limitation, providing that such and such children of another class may go into the schools of the District of Columbia.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that my amendment contains the identical language carried in the appropriation bill of 1933 and previous bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. Title V, section 76, United States Code, that the gentleman refers to, provides that children of employees of the United States stationed outside of the District of Columbia shall be admitted to the public schools without payment of tuition.

The Chair is of the opinion, therefore, that the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas is not well taken, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, as my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says, this is an ancient controversy. He "fit, bled, and died," so to speak, over it long before I was ever elected a Member of Congress, but it is not as old as the gentleman says, because in the law of 1913 it is specifically provided that these children from outside of the District may come in and attend the schools free of tuition. The Congress does not enact legislation without some reason behind it, and there is a reason behind this legislation. I have not the time to give you all of the reasons, but here is the potent reason. In Arlington County, just across the river, a census of Government employees was conducted about a year ago and it shows that there were approximately 2,000 of them living in that county. At 5 to a family that would mean 10,000 people who draw their living from the Government, out of a population of between 25,000 and 30,000 people. In other words, about one-third of the people of that county are making their living by working for the Government in the District. They come to Washington every day; and they draw their pay in Washington, and they spend their pay in Washington. Their money is all spent here in the business of this town, which builds up taxation that arises from business, and enables the people here to maintain these schools. In Arlington County, there is no business area, there is no business district, it is almost exclusively residential; and these folks who come from here come because they find cheaper living, perhaps better living, perhaps more hospitable surroundings, and they come into our State and merely rent a house or buy a small piece of property, and their taxes contribute very little to the conduct of the schools in Arlington County.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But these people who send their children to school here pay their taxes to Maryland and Virginia, and pay their automobile license and automobile property taxes to those States.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. As to the automobile taxes, I am afraid that a great many of them do not do that who ought to do it. Some may and some may not. The man who owns an equity in a house over there probably pays $30 or $40 a year taxes, which would not pay for the tuition of one child. Arlington County, without any business to maintain its tax rate, has built the finest schools in the State of Virginia. That county has bonded itself to the point almost of breaking in order that these people who come out from Washington may have the very best educational facilities that could be afforded, and I am happy to advise you that right here at your door are these schools in Arlington County that are rated the very best in Virginia. Of all the schools in the State of Virginia, Arlington County schools rank the highest.

You have the Fort Myer Military Reservation there, and the children in that reservation, who do not live in the State of Virginia and whose parents do not pay any taxes in the State of Virginia, are privileged to attend the public and high schools of the county of Arlington, and I make this statement upon knowledge after having obtained the information from the superintendent of schools this morning. There is the Fort Myer Reservation there with a great many officers and men who have children who go to those schools. There is also Quantico down here in Prince William County, and then there is Fort Humphreys, and all of those Army posts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PRALL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14643, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR EVENING SESSION

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session to-night.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what will be the program after the memorial services to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The resolution provides for adjournment.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

A joint resolution of the Senate of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and under the rule referred as follows:

S. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to render findings of facts in the claim of the Mack Copper Co.; to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 4368. An act for the relief of George W. McDonald;

H. R. 7518. An act to amend an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and

H. R. 13710. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 4368. An act for the relief of the widow of George W. McDonald;

H. R. 6456. An act to amend section 98 of the Judicial Code, as amended;

H. R. 7518. An act to amend an act entitled "An act extending certain privileges of canal employees to other officials on the Canal Zone and authorizing the President to make rules and regulations affecting health, sanitation, quarantine, taxation, public roads, self-propelled vehicles, and police powers on the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, including provision as to certain fees, money orders, and interest deposits," approved August 21, 1916; and

H. R. 13710. An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE GOODWIN

Mr. CHRISTGAU. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad and painful duty to announce to the House the death of our colleague, GODFREY G. GOODWIN, of Minnesota, who passed away early this morning at his home in this city.

I send to the desk the following resolutions and ask for their immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 385

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. GODFREY G. GOODWIN, a Representative from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That a committee of two Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following committee to attend the funeral: Mr. KNUTSON, Mr. JACOBSEN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the remaining resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The resolution was agreed to.

RECESS

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

---

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAINEY.

JOHN S. ABBOTT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session this evening to consider bills on the Private Calendar, commencing where the call last left off.

The Clerk will call the first bill.

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1617, for the relief of John S. Abbott.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will be very glad to reserve the objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this bill with the gentleman who reserves objection, and I believe the objection of the gentleman is based upon the theory that in the Spanish-American War volunteer regiments employed civilian cooks, and the gentleman is under the impression that this particular individual who is proposed to be relieved by this bill acted in that capacity in his company. I would like to review the circumstances as they were.

This man, John S. Abbott, was a member of the Muskegon Company of the Michigan National Guard at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War. He went to Island Lake with his company, along with other members of the guard. He was examined by the examining surgeon and rejected for further service because of the fact he had what is known as "hammer toes." I know something about that particular disability, because it was the thing that almost kept me out of the Spanish-American War with the Thirty-third Michigan Regiment.

He discussed the matter with the surgeon and asked if he could have an operation and by that means qualify for service during the war. The surgeon told him he could. He went to Ann Arbor, to the University of Michigan, and had that operation performed, and later joined his company. When the company left Michigan it was decided by the surgeon that he was not yet in a condition to give satisfactory service because of the condition of his feet. Notwithstanding the fact he was rejected by the surgeon, he went with his company wherever it went. He was taken to Cuba as a private, notwithstanding the fact that he was not on the pay roll and was not being paid. There is an affidavit in the report from the captain of the company, who now lives in Ohio, and probably has not seen this man for years, who stated, among other things—

That Jack S. Abbott, of Muskegon, Mich., was a member of Company C, Fifth Infantry Michigan National Guard, and on April 26, 1898, went with his company to Island Lake, Mich., and there volunteered with his company for service in Cuba.

That he took part with his company in all actions and movements before Santiago, and under fire, and made several trips to Siboney and later to Santiago for medicines and food supplies for the company.

That from the time he left the home station until the time he returned to it he performed the same kind and quantity of service as any member of the company and conducted himself in the same manner that he would have had he been mustered into the service of the United States.

Now it is disclosed by the Adjutant General's Department that this man reported at the hospital at different times with disabilities and was treated at the hospital for those disabilities. He is recorded in the medical records of the Adjutant General's Department as a private of Company C, Thirty-fourth Michigan Volunteer Infantry.

We have affidavits from members of his company. We have one from Charles E. Greene, who was a private in the company, and who testified that this man performed all the duties of a soldier while with the company all during its service in the Spanish-American War.

We have an affidavit from Edward F. Plunkett, another private of the company, and he said this man performed all the duties of a soldier, including guard duty. I want to remark, Mr. Speaker, that in a Michigan regiment no man could possibly perform guard duty if he were recognized as a civilian by the company.

We have another affidavit from John Stoppels, and still another from Clinton E. Brown, both of whom testify to the fact that this man was recognized as a private in the company and performed all the duties of a soldier while with that company.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that any man who, through a desire to serve his country, is willing to do what this man did, is entitled to the recognition that this bill seeks to give him, and I am sure the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON] is not going to object to the bill.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, from the record of the War Department and from the statement of Mr. Frank C. Whitney, who was captain of that Michigan company, it appears that John S. Abbott was probably one of the best camp followers that ever went along with a company. If he had just attended to the little detail of being physically fit to go with them, and had gotten himself enlisted, there would be no question. All of his service is honorable. All of his conduct is good. According to the reports, he was taken care of as if he belonged, but he knew and they knew that he did not belong, and the War Department has no record of his enlistment. As far as I can find out—and I have made rather extensive inquiries—at no time has this Congress or the War Department recognized as a person entitled to any pension benefits one who had not taken the oath to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States and had himself sworn in as a soldier.

I do not want to be in the position of objecting in such way as to cast any discredit on this man or his service to his country. It was most creditable, but I do not find any precedent; and I am not here to establish a precedent of granting a pension or putting a man in a pensionable status who did not in fact belong to either the Army or the Navy Department of the United States.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman reserve further his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman has stated that this man neglected a very important detail, and that was to become regularly enrolled as a member of the company. This man neglected no detail. When he discovered that he was supposed to be physically unfit for service, he did a thing that few men did in order to serve; he went to the University Hospital at Ann Arbor, Mich., and there had an operation performed to correct the deformity on his toes.

The fact that he was in good condition notwithstanding the decision of the Surgeon General who again examined him——

Mr. EATON of Colorado. And again rejected him for bad eyesight.

Mr. WOODRUFF. But notwithstanding that rejection he demonstrated by actual service on his part that he was fit for service, as his record states, as sworn to by the captain of his company and certain of his colleagues; and I do not believe the gentleman from Colorado is going to stand against a man who did all this man did in order to patriotically serve his country.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOHN G. DWYER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2246, a bill for the relief of John G. Dwyer.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call attention to the report from the War Department on this case; and I quote from it as follows:

Lieutenant Dwyer was specifically charged with failure to examine and administer treatment to an enlisted man who was properly reported on sick report by his company commander. The Judge Advocate General, after a careful review of the case, stated that the guilt of the accused was established beyond all doubt, and that the sentence imposed was authorized by law. He recommended that the sentence of dismissal be confirmed. The Secretary of War (Mr. Baker), in forwarding the case to the President for action, recommended that the sentence imposed by the court be confirmed. The Secretary of War and the Judge Advocate General considered the sentence inadequate, in view of the grave dereliction of duty which the testimony showed the accused to be guilty of, but recommended that the sentence be confirmed so that the accused might not wholly escape punishment.

Here is what the President, Woodrow Wilson, had to say:

In the foregoing case of First. Lieut. John G. Dwyer, Medical Officers' Reserve Corps, the sentence of dismissal imposed by the general court-martial is hereby confirmed and will be carried into execution.

Signed, Woodrow Wilson.

Here is the further report of the Secretary of War:

After a careful review of the case I can find no mitigating circumstances that would warrant a reversal by special legislation of the action already taken, as a result of which the beneficiary was separated from the military service. Accordingly I recommend that H. R. 4067 be not favorably considered by your committee and be not enacted into law.

Under those conditions, Mr. Speaker, however much I regret having to do so, I must object.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, if the gentleman desires to make a statement.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement in regard to this case.

In October, 191—, this man, Dr. John Dwyer, was in charge of a hospital unit at Camp Funston, Kans. There were 4,000 raw troops there with a sick call of about 1,200 a day. Dr. John Dwyer and two assistants had to examine them for what they thought was the matter with them. They would pass before Doctor Dwyer and if he thought there was anything the matter with them he would pass them on to these two assistants of his to make an examination and report.

The man in question who said he was sick was sent to these other doctors, who examined him and found there was not much the matter with him. It was at a time when the "flu" was beginning to get epidemic and they had not yet discovered the virulent form of it.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. Was that information before The Adjutant General, the Secretary of War, and the President of the United States?

Mr. BLANTON. Why certainly they knew all about it. They knew better about it than the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. No; they did not know better about it than I do. I did not know about all the facts until they were brought out before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It was the duty of this doctor to treat the privates under him, was it not?

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Yes; in so far as it was humanly possible for him to treat them, and he did follow the proper method of taking care of them.

Mr. BLANTON. The officer who investigated the case backed up by The Adjutant General and the Secretary of War, and backed up by the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, said it was a case of gross negligence; and they would not have so held had there been no cause.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALL of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. I am sympathetic about this case, but I can not see the slightest loophole through which we can relieve this man.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to object to it, in any event.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOHN S. STOTTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2803, for the relief of John S. Stotts, deceased.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers John S. Stotts, deceased, late of Company E, One hundred and twenty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment on the 26th day of June, 1865: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, after the date "1865," insert the following: "Notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the act relating to pensions approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act approved May 11, 1908."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

LEONARD THEODORE BOICE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3459, for the relief of Leonard Theodore Boice.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to object to the bill.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In order for the gentleman to express his views; yes.

Mr. FULMER. This is the case of Leonard Theodore Boice. Mr. Boice was a very intelligent man, a man who held prominent positions up until he entered the service. He was appointed second lieutenant, but because of a weakness for whisky he was asked by his captain to resign for the good of the service, and his resignation was accepted.

Later he died and left a wife and a child of 10.

Up to the time of his resignation he had never committed any crime, he had never been court-martialed; he had a perfectly good record except a weakness for drink. He had about $350 adjusted-compensation money. His record now shows that the resignation was accepted and left him without an honorable or dishonorable discharge.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I know all about the case; I have read it very carefully.

This case comes within the class where a man left the service during the period of the war. He left the service in August, 1918, when his organization was leaving for France. Some other mother's boy went in his place, and we do not know whether that other mother's boy ever returned.

Here is a man that was intoxicated time after time. He was a lieutenant. If he had been a private, he would have been sent to the penitentiary.

I have objected to bills of this character. I do not think the committee should report bills where the men violated their oath during the period of the war. If this had occurred after November 11, 1918, I would shake hands with the gentleman and say, "Give him everything you can give him." But this man, on August 10, 1918, resigned when his regiment was going abroad. The resignation was sent direct and not through the corps commander. He was ordered out because he was continually drunk.

I can not let bills of this character pass and retain my self-respect, and I must object, Mr. Speaker.

HARRY C. ANDERSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4395, for the relief of Harry C. Anderson.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of this bill.

BERYL M. M'HAM

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 10070, for the relief of Beryl M. McHam.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection in this case?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I withhold the objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Let me state to the gentleman that this is the most appealing case that has ever come before the Military Affairs Committee. It is the only case on record in this country where the American Legion has passed resolutions asking for an honorable discharge.

The testimony in this case shows that this man volunteered in March, 1917; that in June he was transported to France, and he went into action with the Twenty-sixth Division. He fought for 72 days in the front-line trenches without any relief. He then had a few days' relief. He fought with the younger Colonel Roosevelt and was one of 15 men who came back out of a company of 250 men that went into action.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If the gentleman will permit, I may say that this man received a citation for bravery. The committee went into this case very carefully. The man to-day is a mental and physical wreck. His war record is wonderful. There is no question about that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that in this case this man went through every single engagement on the various fronts in France—all of them—he was kept in the army of occupation after the war closed, and, in 1919 because he had some fist fights, he was tried and given a heavy sentence. Any man who serves in the Army is liable to have a fist fight once in a while. I think it is rather to his credit that once in a while he has one. If he is the kind of man we want in the Army, he is the kind of man who will fight when he is insulted. After we entered the war a fine young railroad employee of the Texas & Pacific Railway Co. went from Big Spring, Tex., down to the training camp at San Antonio and he succeeded in getting his commission. He went across and became a captain, and one day a colonel insulted him in Paris, and just as soon as the war was over he whipped that colonel and he was tried and kicked out of the Army; and it took Senator SHEPPARD and myself months to get this man reinstated. I think one of the best things he has on his record is whipping this colonel. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman will find a number of good records like that where buck privates have whipped shave-tail lieutenants after the war, and they ought to be given a medal for doing it.

Mr. BLANTON. And this was a railroad man.

Mr. SWANK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SWANK. I happen to know this boy. He lives in the district represented by my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN]. He is just a poor, old, working boy. He went over as a volunteer with the First Division. I know his reputation and I know he is a good man; and, as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] has said, this is a worthy bill.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding this man was tried by court-martial and given a dishonorable discharge, the report of the Secretary of War includes the following distinguished-service record of Beryl M. McHam during the World War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
March 12, 1932.

The records show that Beryl M. McHam enlisted March 28, 1917, at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., and was assigned to Company A, Nineteenth Infantry; was transferred to Company C, Twenty-sixth Infantry; and left the United States for foreign service June 14, 1917. He served in the Sommerville sector from October 21 to November 20, 1917; in the Ansauville sector from January 15 to April 3, 1918; in the Cantigny sector from April 25 to June 8, 1918, and from June 14 to July 7, 1918; and in the Saizerais sector from August 14 to 24, 1918. He participated in the Montdidier-Noyon defensive from June 9 to 13, 1918; in the Aisne-Marne offensive from July 18 to 21, 1918; in the St. Mihiel offensive from October 1 to 12, 1918; was gassed in action July 21, 1918, for which he was treated at base hospital No. 20 from July 21 to August 14, 1918.

I therefore withdraw the objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not wish to disparage in any particular the wonderful record of this young man, but I wish to inquire of the gentleman who reported the bill as to the reasons why, in reporting it, it did not contain the saving clause that no compensation or pension should be held to have accrued prior to the enactment of the act?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Because this man is a physical and mental wreck, all caused by having been in the war. There is not any question about it. It is a pitiable case, and if ever a man deserved compensation, this man did.

Mr. STAFFORD. Leaving out the sob part, because I know all about that part of it, and I know he had a very creditable record, I am inquiring why in this instance the committee did not recommend the saving clause that no pension, bounty, or compensation shall be allowed prior to the passage of the act?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Because we think this man is entitled to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has been the general policy to incorporate such a proviso.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is the very thing we do not want in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If such a saving clause were incorporated in the bill, what privilege would be denied this man?

Mr. McKEOWN. He would be denied his little $60 bonus.

Mr. BLANTON. The saving clause in this case would not save him.

Mr. McKEOWN. No; it would ruin him; and that question was presented to the committee.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. This is a very pitiable case.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the third time the gentleman has said that, and if the gentleman says it a half dozen times more I shall begin to doubt it.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Beryl M. McHam, who served in Company C, Twenty-sixth Regiment, and Company C, Eighth Regiment, United States Infantry, World War, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States on the 7th day of July, 1920.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

DAN I. SULTAN

The Clerk read the next resolution on the Private Calendar, House Joint Resolution 223, granting permission to Lieut. Col. Dan I. Sultan, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to accept decorations and medals bestowed upon him by the Government of the Republic of Nicaragua.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, there are several bills of this character on the calendar. Personally I am not much in sympathy with the idea of having medals and decorations bestowed by foreign governments on civilians or military officers of our Government doing civilian work.

This man was engaged in work for the United States Government, making a survey of the Nicaraguan Canal. He did his duty. Why should we allow him to receive decorations from the Nicaraguan Government for services to them? I do not like the idea. I have objected to omnibus bills carrying decorations to large numbers. But I am fundamentally opposed to allowing Army officers to receive foreign decorations from other governments.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. This man did a great service during the earthquake, and I think we ought to be pleased and gratified that they want to confer these decorations upon him, showing the friendly relations between the Republics.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware that we have had some trouble by reason of Sandino objecting to the entrance by the United States into their affairs. The War Department recommends that this matter be deferred, and I object.

LESLIE R. GROVES

The Clerk read the next resolution on the Private Calendar, House Joint Resolution 244, granting permission to First Lieut. Leslie R. Groves, jr., Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to accept certain medals bestowed upon him by the Government of the Republic of Nicaragua.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, this is a similar case to the one we have just discussed, only relating to another officer. I object, for the reasons stated.

PAUL R. HAWLEY

The Clerk read the next resolution on the Private Calendar, House Joint Resolution 225, granting permission to Paul R. Hawley, major, Medical Corps, United States Army, to accept certain medals bestowed upon him by the Government of the Republic of Nicaragua.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, the War Department asks that this matter be deferred for the reasons I have already stated. I object.

Mr. HESS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. HESS. I understand that this doctor was the sole medical man left after the earthquake of Nicaragua. He did splendid work for Nicaragua, and for that reason the Government wishes to bestow upon him this medal.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not in sympathy with the policy of allowing American officials to receive decorations from foreign governments, therefore, I object.

TO AID THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC IN ITS MEMORIAL DAY SERVICES, MAY 30, 1932

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 4235, to aid the Grand Army of the Republic in its Memorial Day services, May 30, 1932.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of making a statement. I desire to say that it would be utterly futile to enact this bill, for the reason that the time fixed has long since passed. I was opposed to reporting it, but was outvoted in the committee. It is untimely, it seems to me, to grant financial assistance for a celebration observed by the Government in days past. I, therefore, move to lay this bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

IRVING LINDSAY LEAFE

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 817) for the relief of Irving Lindsay Leafe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I object.

CHARLES J. EISENHAUER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 919) for the relief of Charles J. Eisenhauer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask the gentleman from New York who reported this bill a question? In case this bill should pass, the gentleman would protect the House in the closing hours of Congress in keeping the amount down to $2,500 and not allow it to be increased to the amount claimed in the bill?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. I think, in view of the question of policy, that ought to be done anyway.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman would not object to the usual clause that it is in full settlement of all claims against the United States?

Mr. BLACK. No.

Mr. BLANTON. And also the clause limiting any attorney fees to the usual 10 per cent?

Mr. BLACK. That also.

Mr. BLANTON. With such understanding I shall not object.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I did not hear all of the colloquy that occurred, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. It is only that the gentleman would protect the House in keeping this amount down to 50 per cent of the amount of the claim, and would permit the usual clause to be inserted that it is in full settlement of all claims against the United States Government, and also the usual 10 per cent attorney-fee clause.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Under my reservation of objection I call the attention of the chairman of the Claims Committee to the fact that although it appears from the report accompanying the bill that there has been some report from the Navy Department, it is not included in the report we have to-night.

Mr. BLACK. I have the department's letter, but it was so long that it would take too much printing. I might say, however, that the Navy Department recommends against the payment of the claim.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The Membership of the House has no means of knowing what questions are involved from the Government standpoint, unless the report of the department interested is made a part of the committee report. I have a further objection that I must insist upon, and unless the gentleman will agree to it I shall object. It appears from the little we have of the Navy Department report that the injuries sustained by this man were entirely superficial. The examination made by the Navy physician a few weeks after the accident occurred shows that the man had a healed lacerated wound on his arm, a healed wound on his shoulder, a healed wound on his hip, and a healed abrasion on his abdomen. Those are simple bruises and cuts and scratches. Two thousand five hundred dollars as an award for such injuries is entirely out of proportion; and unless the gentleman is willing to accept an amendment reducing the amount to $1,000, I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. BLACK. It is probably unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, from the point of view of the claimant, that the report of the Navy Department is not printed in full. The report shows that while the first medical report gave the probable duration of the disability as two months, it appears from the second medical report that there is evidence of some permanent injury, as the claimant in 1928, nine years after the first examination, did not have the full use of his right arm.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Of course, when a bill comes up in 1933 for an injury occurring in 1919, one wonders at the delay.

Mr. BLACK. The delay was entirely due to the fault of the objectors in Congress heretofore, and I trust it will not continue.

Mr. STAFFORD. O Mr. Speaker, I am not going to allow that omnibus slight to be cast against the men here who do their duty. With the multiplicity of claim bills that have been reported in this session and the last session, I am beginning to believe that there is some method in scurrying up hoary old claims that have never before been presented. This bill has never been presented before.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, yes; it has.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are so many of these hoary stale claims, it makes one think that some ambulance chaser, especially in the city of New York, or some claim agent is going around, hunting around for these old claims that occurred 15 to 20 years ago and unearthing them for the first time.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, the gentleman from Wisconsin is entirely too excited.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from Wisconsin think he is unfair and unjust to our friend from New York?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I am going to pay him a high compliment on some other occasion.

Mr. BLANTON. To leave that in the RECORD does not do justice to his character and the hard work that our friend does as chairman of this committee.

Mr. BLACK. The only difficulty with the statement is that those who read the RECORD do not hear the gentleman make the statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Somebody reading this cold RECORD in the morning would take it from the gentleman's remarks that my friend from New York is connected with these ambulance chasers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; that is the farthest from my thought. The gentleman from New York knows I have great admiration for him.

Mr. BLACK. I am sure the gentleman from Wisconsin did not intend to make such a suggestion as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] believes somebody might think from reading the RECORD; but if there is any unusual activity concerning claims from New York it is because New York City, for the time being, happens to have the chairmanship of the Claims Committee, and he is going to look after his own when he can.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the fundamental rule of Democracy that rules that city.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. It is only fair to state why we have so many claims on the calendar at this session. It is because the members of the Claims Committee have been working day and night. They have been considering bills which have been introduced session after session and which could not be reached. There have been thousands of bills before that committee year after year that have not been considered. Because we have such a great quantity of bills reported from the committee, it is no indication that these claims are presented by ambulance chasers.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I shall object unless the gentleman agrees to accept an amendment reducing the amount from $2,500 to $1,000, and a further amendment reciting that this settlement shall be in full for all claims against the Government, and a further amendment which will contain the usual attorney's fee clause. If the gentleman will accept those amendments, I will have no objection. If he will not accept them, then I object.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman is asking too much when he is asking to cut this to $1,000. I am willing to cut it to $2,000. I have seen this claim year in and year out since I have been a member of this committee.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. There is no evidence in this report which justifies any substantial award. The report shows, such of it as we are permitted to read, that there were some abrasions and contusions, but no permanent or serious injuries. To my mind, a thousand dollars is an adequate award, and unless the gentleman from New York will accept that amount, I feel constrained to object.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman realizes I am up against a pretty difficult proposition when he takes the arbitrary position that I must accept his figure or he will object.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Whatever we award this man is a pure gratuity, a pure gift. There is no liability whatever on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. BLACK. I admit there is a question as to liability. I do not think there is any question of damages if we admit liability, but in view of the fact that there is a question of liability, I am willing to compromise on this if I can. The claim was originally for $5,000. I think the gentleman has accomplished a great deal if he allows this claim to be settled for $1,500.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I must insist on my reservation of the right to object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I will accept the $1,000.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill by this auction-block system.

ROGER P. AMES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1975, to amend an act entitled "An act to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever," approved February 28, 1929, as amended, by including Roger P. Ames among those honored by said act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am afraid the gentleman has not had access to the data that really entitles Doctor Ames to be upon the roll of honor.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The only information I have is what is contained in the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, that is very meager. I have unquestioned evidence before me that Doctor Ames was associated with Major Reed, in constant correspondence with him, and all the experimental cases were put under Doctor Ames's direct control. He personally attended them. He kept the entire history; he made all the notes and transmitted those notes to Doctor Reed, and Doctor Reed wrote up the notes and the experiments for the world, announcing this great experiment. As a matter of fact, Doctor Ames did more work and took more risk—and contracted yellow fever in doing so—than any other man connected with that board.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I have no doubt that Doctor Ames was a most capable doctor and a very heroic man and that he rendered distinguished service, but the act of February 28, 1929, was for the purpose of giving recognition to Dr. Walter Reed and his associates, who voluntarily submitted themselves to inoculation from yellow fever, so that science could test the means of infection and the means of transmission of that horrible disease. Many of those men died; all of them were made miserably sick. Doctor Ames may have been willing to assume this great risk, but he did not do it.

It further appears from the report that he was given adequate recognition—perhaps not adequate, but at least recognition—when he was commissioned a captain in the Regular Army. I think it cheapens the reward given to those who did this heroic service beyond the call of duty by including in it some one who did not perform the same service, and I must object.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My colleague certainly must misunderstand the facts. Nobody submitted themselves to the test of being infected except volunteer or private citizens, who were paid to do it. The board did not subject themselves to the test. None of the Army officers subjected themselves to the test.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Those mentioned in the act that is sought to be amended submitted themselves to the infection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; two classes submitted themselves to the test. The first class never submitted themselves to the test at all. None of the Army officers in the board submitted themselves to the test.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Then the information contained in the report of the War Department is not correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In substance, this is the information from the War Department: The War Department recognized three classes to be enrolled on this honor roll. The scientific board which did the laboratory work and wrote the papers was the first class. None of them submitted themselves to the test. Second, those who were infected voluntarily by the yellow-fever mosquito; third, those who were infected voluntarily by blood infusion. These are the three classes. I am only seeking to put Doctor Ames among that scientific class on that medical board, where he deserves recognition.

I want my colleague to remember this: He was put in immediate charge of these yellow-fever patients. He came in daily contact with them month in and month out. He made all the observations, wrote their history, and sent it to Major Reed, who wrote up the papers for the public. As a result, he actually contracted yellow fever in those barracks and was treated for yellow fever at the same barracks where he was in charge of the yellow-fever patients.

Another thing to bear in mind is that not a single one of these infected patients lost his life. My colleague is mistaken there. Major Reed wrote Doctor Ames a letter telling him it was a feather in his cap that he never lost a single patient, whereas the average loss in other yellow-fever cases was 25 per cent.

This does not cost the Government anything except the price of a little medal; that is all; no pension is involved.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The War Department points out in its report that we have had many heroic doctors and many heroic nurses, and many heroic enlisted men in the Hospital Corps who have served in yellow-fever-infested camps and in yellow-fever hospitals. Many of them have contracted this horrible disease. Doctor Ames is among them. He undoubtedly rendered splendid service, but he rendered no extraordinary service such as these other men did who are recognized by the act of February 28, 1929. The last sentence of the report from The Adjutant General is:

> Nothing has been found of record in this office to show that Roger P. Ames took part in or submitted himself in any manner to the experiments conducted by the yellow-fever board.

Mr. Chairman, I object.

ABRAM L. GERSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4109, for the relief of Abram L. Gerson (Abe A. Gerson).

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Let the lady's bill go through.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I can not. I object.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a number of my colleagues have asked me to ask the Speaker to suspend the rules and allow the gentlemen on the floor of the House to-night to smoke. I am very glad to do this for my colleagues, particularly in view of the courteous treatment I have always received at their hands.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentlewoman's request is put I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been downcast and sick at heart to-day. I believe that a large majority of the mothers and fathers of America to-night are downcast and sick at heart. At a time when at least 12,000,000 men are without jobs, whose families, wives, and little children are undernourished, hungry, and some sick, without means of obtaining food and clothing and shelter, beer seems to be the uppermost topic just now in Washington. At a time when great calamities have been coming over the country, with all the banks of a great State closed up and finances trembling, when a cowardly anarchist last night murderously attempted to take the life of the President elect of this Nation, when the mayor of a great city was stricken by an assassin's bullet, when innocent women and children were ruthlessly shot down by a damnable public enemy, at a time when one of our colleagues, sick and overwhelmed by misfortune, this morning falls out of a fifth-story window and is killed, the Congress of the Nation is engaged in plans to bring back intoxicating liquor and saloons upon the people; at such a moment I am afraid my great Democratic Party is selling its birthright for a mess of pottage.

I want to hold out a word of encouragement to the fathers and mothers of the United States to-night: It is a long way from a mere Senate vote to repeal of the eighteenth amendment and to the return of the saloon; it is a long, long way. We will once more take up this fight, where we left off when the eighteenth amendment was passed. They shall not pass.

I want to say to the great majority leader who now presides over this House to-night as Speaker and to our caucus chairman that I hope they will not do as the press says they are going to do—ever call a Democratic caucus to bind Democrats to vote on a question of principle. [Applause.] For on a question of principle no Democratic caucus can bind Democrats.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry. I regret my time is too limited. It is a question of principle as to whether or not the Congress of the United States will ever afflict this Nation again with the open saloon. Fortunately, thank God, in the Democratic Party there is no caucus that can bind a man to violate his conscience on a question of principle or to violate a pledge he has made to his constituents.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How about the Democratic platform?

Mr. BLANTON. The Democratic platform was made at Chicago by delegates who did not carry out the will of the constituents who elected them and gave them power. The great State of Texas in its convention elected its delegates and instructed them to go to Chicago and vote against repeal and vote against beer and vote against saloons; yet every last one of them violated their instructions. I want to say that a platform promulgated in that kind of convention, held by traitorous delegates who violated the will and instruction of the people back home never binds any Democrat in a Congress or legislature.

I am a loyal Democrat. I believe in my party and its principles and traditions. Hitherto it has stood for the best interests of the people. It has not chased off after any unworthy phantoms. Its objects heretofore have always been worthy. Up to this time no Democrat has had to apologize for carrying its banner. No past achievement has ever brought embarrassment or the blush of shame to any Democrat. But what has happened to-day makes us pause and wonder whither are we drifting.

I know that this speech and my vote Monday will take from me my office. I know that it will bring upon me renewed attacks from a subsidized wet press. I know that to be wet just now brings great political popularity. But I will still have left my own self-respect.

I remember a great feast, the feast of Belshazzar. When there was wine flowing and mirth and laughter, not happiness but mirth and laughter was at its height, there appeared on the wall the words, "Mene, mene, tekel upharsin"—"thou hast been weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that in the conduct of affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States all discussion must be conducted in the English language.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Perhaps the gentleman will translate that.

Mr. BLANTON. I have translated it for the benefit of all wets. I hope the Chair will not take these facetious obstructive points of order out of the little time I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I will not.

Mr. BLANTON. Attending a dinner engagement last night forced me to sit in my office until 1.30 o'clock this morning working on this calendar. Has anybody else done that? I do that kind of work on every calendar coming up here. Do you not think I have the right to speak in this forum without facetious interruptions of this character?

I want to say this to the serious-minded people of this Nation, who love their children better than anything else in the world. I remember that in the history of all peoples there were two cities that became so immoral and corrupt and which so wantonly violated the laws of the country that God Almighty destroyed them—Sodom and Gomorrah. If we do not watch out, this great Government will merit a like punishment. If we do not watch out there will appear on our banquet wall, "Mene, mene tekel upharsin," which is known to all posted men to mean, "Thou art weighed in the balances and art found wanting."

Mr. SCHAFER. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, but I will object to any other discussion out of order.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman that we are here to consider the Private Calendar, but I do not think it is fair to discuss one side of a great public question without discussing the other side.

I sincerely hope that the Democratic Speaker of this House will recognize a Member of this body to offer a motion to suspend the rules and pass the eighteenth amendment repeal resolution passed by the Senate and carry out the platform pledges of both great parties.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] apparently believes that platforms are only made to run on and forget all about after the election. There is not much difference between the Republican eighteenth amendment repeal platform plank and the resolution in the form that it passed the Senate, except that the Republican platform plank had a great picture painted as to some of the wonderful prosperity we had in some instances under the eighteenth amendment. It wore a dress that scared a great many people away from it. It is not necessary to call a caucus of the Democratic brethren in order to pass the repeal resolution.

All you have to do is to convert six of the many live-duck Democrats who voted against repeal on the first day of this session.

I was over in another body the other day, listening to a distinguished Democratic leader from one of the Southern States, eloquently pleading for the immediate submission of a naked repeal resolution, and it was rather strange to me, because such a repeal resolution, on the first day of this session, was defeated by only six votes, and seven Democratic Members of this House from the State of this distinguished leader who are members of his own party from the State of Arkansas, lined up and voted against it. They were not lame-duck Congressmen, but reelected on a wet platform.

So you do not have to call a caucus. All you have to do is to have that great Democratic leader who made this fight yesterday and to-day in favor of submission, convert six of the seven Members of this body from his State and then we will have sufficient votes to speed this question on to the people's conventions as promised by both major parties.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. For 10 years we have been trying to convert some of the Members from Wisconsin, who still remain dry in spite of that great industry in Milwaukee and throughout the gentleman's State. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHAFER. I can not convert any of the Members from Wisconsin any more than the gentleman from New York can convert the gentleman from Texas whom he sits beside at this moment. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I was going to ask the gentleman how he could take care of Arkansas if the gentleman can not take care of Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. I am not trying to take care of Arkansas, and I do not profess to be a great leader of a great party in a legislative body and wax eloquent about principle and then admit that I can not even convert one of my own delegation of seven to carry out this principle and carry out the platform pledges of my party.

It would be a rather strange condition if the Democratic brethren who call a caucus such as they called with reference to imports from depreciated-currency countries, and bind their members, and then when his name is called have the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] rise and vote "aye" on submitting a naked eighteenth amendment repeal resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. But he would not do it, I will tell the gentleman that now. And our Democratic caucus will not attempt to so bind me. I am under pledge to my 350,000 constituents to fight all attempts to repeal the eighteenth amendment which would afflict them again with the open saloon.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman from Texas running away from his party? Is he not running away from the great Speaker of his party from the State of Texas, whom he placed in nomination for the Presidency here at the last session?

Mr. BLANTON. There is no room in the real heart of the Democratic Party for the open saloon. The Democratic Party has gotten along without making intoxicating liquor its most sacred idol for over 100 years, and can do it for another 100 years. The great Democratic Party stands for principles higher and more important than liquor and saloons.

Mr. SCHAFER. I believe that after next Monday, when this House approves the Senate resolution for the naked repeal of the eighteenth amendment and submits it to the States for ratification, the gentleman's own State of Texas, led by that distinguished Democrat, Ma Ferguson, will ratify, and be one of the first to ratify, the gentleman's objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The question is not going to be submitted to State legislatures.

Mr. SCHAFER. To State conventions; yes.

I believe the gentleman's State will be one of the first to ratify, and then we will again each year get into the now-burdened Treasury of the taxpayers of the United States what we received in 1919, $483,000,000, in revenue on beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol, and we will not have to expend $40,000,000 each year from an overburdened Treasury for prohibition enforcement. If the gentleman from Texas is for the overburdened taxpayers, as he so loudly and often boasts, he should make a speech in favor of repealing the eighteenth amendment, and I know that we would surely get the six Democratic votes which we needed to pass it on the first day of this session. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Texas is not thinking of taxes or money, but has first in mind the happiness and health and welfare of the fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, and homes of America. They are of first importance.

RELINQUISHING THE TITLE OF THE UNITED STATES TO CERTAIN LANDS IN THE COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 637, to relinquish the title of the United States to certain lands in the county of Los Angeles, State of California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether the law of California with reference to persons owning land bordering on streams gives them title to the median line?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any mineral rights involved in this?

Mr. EVANS of California. No, none; no rights involved.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to any land supposed to exist between the east boundary of the Rancho San Francisquito and the west boundary of the Rancho La Puente, in township 1 south, range 11 west, San Bernardino meridian, according to the plats of survey on file in the General Land Office, be, and the same are hereby, granted, released, and relinquished by the United States, to the equitable owners of the equitable titles thereto and to their respective heirs and assigns forever, as fully and completely, in every respect whatever, as could be done by patents issued according to law: Provided, That this act shall amount only to a relinquishment of any title that the United States has or is supposed to have in and to any of said lands, and shall not be construed to abridge, impair, injure, prejudice, or divest in any manner any valid right, title, or interest of any person or body corporate whatever, the true intent of this act being to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the true owners of said lands under the laws of California, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of the said interest, title, and estate of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SAMUEL C. DAVIS

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 1705, for the relief of Samuel C. Davis.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HESS. Reserving the right to object, I wonder if gentlemen will object to the usual attorney's fee amendment.

Mr. PITTENGER. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. BUTLER] introduced this bill. I have no interest in it.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Samuel C. Davis the sum of $4,725.32 in full settlement of all claims against the Government arising out of a collision between the yacht Whiz and the United States Coast Guard plane OL–5 No. 1 in the harbor of New London, Conn., on June 21, 1930.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorney-fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEASE OR SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS AND BUILDINGS, FORT SCHUYLER, N. Y.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 11685, authorizing the Secretary of War to lease or to sell certain lands and buildings known as Fort Schuyler, N. Y., to the city of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I object.

EDWINA R. MUNCHHOF

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3380, for the relief of Edwina R. Munchhof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

WILLIAM N. FISHBURN

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 7986, for the relief of William N. Fishburn.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William N. Fishburn, who was a member of Company D, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 18th day of October, 1903: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the figures "1903," insert "and notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the act relating to pension approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act approved May 11, 1908."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ZOE A. TILGHMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6933) for the relief of Zoe A. Tilghman.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Zoe A. Tilghman in compensation for the death of her husband, William M. Tilghman, caused by being shot by a Federal prohibition agent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I ask the House to pause for a minute that I may pay tribute to the deceased Member from Oregon, Mr. BUTLER, who reported this bill. I direct the attention of the Members of the House to the report itself, which shows that he prepared it. The late ROBERT R. BUTLER passed away a few months ago. He was a man of exceptional ability, and when he rose on the floor he commanded the attention of the House immediately. When I read the report I was impressed with the scholarly attainments which it showed the author to possess. It is worthy of permanent incorporation in the RECORD. May I read just a paragraph to show you the author's grasp of the conditions?

The name of Bill Tilghman is inseparably connected with the stirring events of the old West, and he was one of the most colorful characters of the Territory of Oklahoma, and previously had been an actor in some of the thrilling events that marked the wild days of western Kansas. He was a man of high character as a citizen and upright and honorable as an officer. For 50 years he had been a law-enforcing official and dealt with some of the most hardened criminals and desperate characters in the old Southwest country.

I might go on and read the full report. All of you will be interested, I know, in the graphic description of the conditions that prevailed in the oil country of the Indian Territory, now the State of Oklahoma.

I am taking this time because I liked BOB BUTLER, as all who knew him liked him. He came to an untimely end. He was a man of virile qualities. He was reared in the gentle fields of Tennessee, and had the mild nature that comes to men born of that soil. He went into the far west of Oregon to hew his way, and he had the sterling, rugged character that won for him distinction by election to this body. Too bad that he was defeated, too bad that BOB BUTLER is no longer with us. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, as a colleague of the late Judge BUTLER, I want to concur in all that the gentleman from Wisconsin has said, and to thank him for saying it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATTERSON: Page 1, line 5, after the figures "$5,000," insert the words "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States" and at the end of the bill insert the following proviso: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to concur in what the gentleman from Wisconsin has said respecting our late colleague, Mr. BUTLER. I had the privilege of serving with him on a committee. When he died the people of Oregon and the people of the United States lost one of the best Members of Congress. I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point his report upon this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House Report 1270, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

ZOE A. TILGHMAN

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 6933):

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6933) for the relief of Zoe A. Tilghman, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

On the night of November 1, 1924, William Tilghman, marshal of the town of Cromwell, Okla., was shot and killed by Wiley Lynn, a Federal prohibition agent, and this bill carries an appropriation in the sum of $5,000 for the benefit of the widow of the said William Tilghman.

The writer of this report desires to avoid undue length, but in fairness to the Members of the House deems it proper to state briefly who the parties to the slaying were and the salient facts and circumstances surrounding the affair.

The name of Bill Tilghman is inseparably connected with the stirring events of the old West, and he was one of the most colorful characters of the Territory of Oklahoma and previous had been an actor in some of the thrilling and exciting events that marked the wild days of western Kansas.

He was a man of high character as a citizen and upright and honorable as an officer. For 50 years he had been a law-enforcing official and dealt with some of the most hardened criminals and desperate characters in the old Southwest country. He had the reputation of always seeking to avoid violence in running down and capturing the most desperate criminals that infested that region, but when necessity arose he was cool and fearless, an expert shot, and quick on the draw and quick on the trigger. His name and presence inspired fear among the lawless, but he never used his weapons until it became an actual necessity, and had the reputation even then of giving his adversary a fair chance.

He served as a scout for the Army stationed at Fort Dodge, Kans., in the early seventies, and in 1876 became deputy sheriff under the famous Bat Masterson and served as marshal of Dodge City in the height of the cattle days, and assisted that fearless official in the thrilling and dangerous enterprises that were necessary to suppress lawlessness and restrain outlaws. He went to Oklahoma in 1889 at the opening up of that country and soon thereafter was appointed United States deputy marshal and served in that difficult and dangerous capacity for 21 years during a period when outlaw bands were common and an official had to be quick on the draw. During that time he took an active and leading part in breaking up the outlaw bands of Dalton, Doolin, Jennings, and others, and single handed captured Doolin, the leader of the Doolin gang, and the most dangerous outlaw of the Territory, as well as many other notorious criminals. He was sent into the interior of old Mexico by the United States Government after a fugitive from justice, and was frequently called upon by various Governors of Oklahoma for the performance of special work when coolness, discretion, and courage were needed. He served as sheriff of Lincoln County, Okla., and represented his district in the State senate, and two years as chief of police at Oklahoma City, and then retired to private life. He belonged to the Bat Masterson and Wild Bill Hickok school of 2-gun peace officers. He was the last of his race.

In 1924 the boom oil town of Cromwell sprang up, and lawlessness of every kind prevailed. Vice flaunted itself, bootlegging of liquor and narcotics was engaged in on every hand, houses of prostitution were notoriously conducted, crime flourished, and criminals boldly defied the law. The only officers there were one or two deputies, under the sheriff at the county-seat town of Wewoka, and Wiley Lynn, a part-Choctaw Indian, who was Federal prohibition agent for the district. Conditions were so unsafe for decent men and women of the community that they appealed to the governor of the State, who recommended that they secure the services of Tilghman; and although he was 70 years of age, he was finally induced to become town marshal and undertake the task of again subduing outlaws, which resulted in his death. Immediately upon his appearance he commenced to vigorously perform his duties and caused fear and hate to seize the souls of the lawless, including Wiley Lynn, with whom there was no open break, but a clash occurred immediately when Tilghman arrested a bootlegger and sent him to jail and he was promptly released upon order of Lynn.

The hostility between the two men never reached an open break until the night of November 1, 1924. At the town of Wewoka lived a notorious woman by the name of Rose Lutke, who conducted a place known as Rose's Rooms. This woman was known also throughout the oil fields as the Rose of Wewoka and was commonly referred to as Lynn's woman, although he was a married man. There also lived at the same town one Eva Caton, who conducted a place known as the Cozy Rooms, and on the afternoon of the above-mentioned date Wiley Lynn and the Lutke woman, together with Eva Caton and a soldier from Fort Sill, left Wewoka in a Ford touring car and drove through Cromwell to Okemah, where they had dinner, and back to Cromwell about 10 o'clock at night.

They had taken a half gallon of liquor along and had stopped at places along the way for more and all had been drinking, and when they reached Cromwell they drove the length of the street, cursing the district judge, who had been severe in his sentences on bootleggers, and finally drew up in front of a restaurant where Tilghman was eating and near a notorious dance hall. Lynn got out of the car and walked across the street with his revolver in his hand and fired a shot, and Tilghman, upon hearing the report, went immediately with his revolver in his hand to where Lynn was standing and caught him by the wrist, while another took the gun from his hand, and then ordered Lynn to go with him and put up his own gun, and after Tilghman had put up his gun Lynn drew another revolver and shot Tilghman twice, from the effects of which he died. Tilghman had grown old and apparently was not quick enough to protect himself from the murderous attack.

The report of the Treasury Department states that Tilghman accosted Lynn and applied a foul epithet to him, which resulted in a scuffle in which Tilghman was shot and killed, but the character of the man, as well as the better class of testimony, refutes this, although it can be said that the report of the department is not adverse as a whole, and merely declines to recommend the passage of the bill. The facts and circumstances and the statements and opinions of the decent and law-abiding people all point to a deliberate and wanton murder. Lynn was indicted for murder after he had rushed before the United States commissioner and was later admitted to bail by the Federal court and an injunction was issued by the Federal judge and several months' time elapsed before the hearings on the injunction and habeas corpus proceedings were concluded and the State had gained the right to try the defendant, but time enough had passed to permit witnesses to disappear and others to become intimidated, and upon the trial the friends of lawlessness testified for Lynn and he claimed that Tilghman was trying to take his life and he, Lynn, beat him to the draw, and the jury acquitted him. All that can be said for the verdict of the jury is that it was a flagrant miscarriage of justice, a triumph of lawlessness, and a reproach to the community, and should not be considered to defeat the allowance of this claim.

A trial might be fair and a verdict of acquittal be justified under the rule of reasonable doubt and a verdict in a civil action with the same facts, where the rule of preponderance of the evidence prevailed, might be justified against the defendant, and therefore the fact that there was a verdict of acquittal in this particular case should not be considered. However, there is no necessity arising for considering the verdict when the facts exist as they do in this case. Judge Frank Mathews, who presided at the trial, in a letter to Hon. FLETCHER B. SWANK, the author of the bill, under date of March 3, 1932, says:

"After hearing the evidence in the trial there was created a lasting impression in my mind that Tilghman was murdered and it amounted to practical assassination.

"Practically all of the witnesses who saw the killing were criminals of the lowest type and their sympathy was against Bill Tilghman and in favor of Lynn. They were prejudiced not only against Tilghman but against any law-abiding and enforcing officer."

CHARLES C. BENNETT

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1673 and consider it at this time.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Is that bill on the Private Calendar?

Mr. BULWINKLE. It is on the calendar, but it has been passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we can not adopt the practice now. We may do so at some subsequent meeting.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection so that I can make an inquiry?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Do I understand then, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, which is No. 191 on the calendar, may be taken up at some subsequent time?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, we can not make any special order like that.

Mr. BULWINKLE. This bill and others like it? I know that we can not make a special order for one bill, but I do know this, that I am trying to find out from the Speaker whether there will be a time when these bills can be taken up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the bills up to the present moment have had their day in court, perhaps too brief, but we have many bills on the calendar that may never be reached. It rests with the presiding officer as majority leader to determine the policy of the House upon the Private Calendar. We can not now go back to some bill that has been objected to. Therefore, I object.

WILLIAM MATHEW SQUIRES

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2601) for the relief of William Mathew Squires.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, William Mathew Squires, late of Company C, Third Regiment Texas Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 16th day of July 1898: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, after the figures "1898," insert "and notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the act relating to pensions approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act approved May 11, 1908."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JOHN P. LEONARD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3969, for the relief of John P. Leonard.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will reserve the objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have read the report. This man was a deserter, and made no attempt, under any of the intervening statutes, to have the record cleared, and comes in at this time, 30 years after his service, and seeks to become the beneficiary of the United States on its pension roll, on the statement that if the records had shown he was a deserter he would have been arrested.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I understand the gentleman's objection now, but The Adjutant General, on behalf of the Secretary of War, in the last paragraph, says:

There is no authority of law whereby the charge of desertion of December 31, 1901, standing on the records against John P. Leonard can be removed.

He had made that attempt. The gentleman will notice he enlisted and served almost three years in the Philippine Islands, engaging in every engagement his company was in. The record shows he had chronic dysentery, and his own statement shows that he was in a hospital and was recommended for discharge because of his disability and put on a vessel and sent back to Camp Douglas, Utah, where he was waiting for his discharge to come on account of the disability; that he left with another soldier, and they never have attempted to apprehend him, although they apprehended the other soldier who was with him. That was after three years of military service, in which he was recommended for discharge on account of his disability. Not only that, but in 1916 he again enlisted in border service and has an honorable discharge for that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will not that subsequent period of honorable service, from which he received an honorable discharge, give him title to pension for the prior service, under existing law?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Absolutely not. As long as that former record stands against him he has no hope whatever. Every comrade with him, who had no more military service than he had, has received a pension for all these years. I know the man personally. He is an honorable man. He has a little business in Martinville. All of his comrades have received all of the emoluments and pensions, and he has received nothing through all these years, although he was recommended for discharge because of disability.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Does the gentleman say he knows this soldier participated in any engagements under fire in the Philippines?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Absolutely; for two and one-half years. Here is his sworn statement that in March, 1899, he enlisted in the Spanish War and Philippine insurrection and went with his company to the Philippine Islands, and on arrival was sent for military service to Company L, Eighteenth Infantry. This company was stationed at Panay Island. He served with Company L during the latter part of 1899 and all of 1900 and until November, 1901, and was in all the campaigns of which Company L, Eighteenth United States Infantry, was engaged in the Philippine Islands. He went through them all.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, in recognition of this claimant's participation in active military service under fire, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers John P. Leonard, late of Company L, Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of said Company L, Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, on the 31st day of December, 1901: Provided, That no bounty, pension, back pay, or allowances shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 12, at the beginning of the line following the word "prior," insert the words "or subsequent."

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this committee amendment. That was not put in there with my knowledge. I would like to make parliamentary inquiry whether I may be heard in opposition to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD. As I have explained to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON], who objected to the bill, this man served almost his entire term of three years in the Philippine Islands, and engaged in every engagement, and was recommended for discharge because of disability, and was sent back on a hospital ship because of that fact. He had all the service that every comrade in that company had, and got the disabilities, as shown by the testimony here. I would like to object to that particular committee amendment, and ask a vote of the House on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GLENN H. CURTISS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 11980, authorizing the President to make a posthumous award of a distinguished-flying cross to Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased, and to present the same to Lua Curtiss, mother of the said Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I know no bill in my 20 years' service in passing upon private bills where I have been so importuned not only while the bill was under consideration in the Committee on Military Affairs, first before the subcommittee that considered it, of which I was a member, then before the full committee, but since it has been reported to the House, as by the author of this bill.

I can appreciate the springs of affection and regard the author of the bill may have to one of her constituents. The difficulty I have is that of cheapening the distinguished flying cross to those whom Congress has previously recognized. I do not place Glenn Curtiss in the same category with Orville and Wilbur Wright.

Mrs. OWEN. May I say to the gentleman that the Secretary of War does, and that the Secretary of the Navy makes a statement in the report that he considers his service exactly of the same value as that performed by the Wright brothers?

Mr. STAFFORD. Maybe the present Secretary of War, who is a young man, may so consider it, but I recall 20 years ago going out to Fort Myer to the first official flight in company with Mr. James R. Mann; and I know at that time Glenn Curtiss did not occupy in the field of aeronautics, or has not at any time since, the high position that Orville and Wilbur Wright occupied.

Mrs. OWEN. May I recall to the gentleman that in the very earliest history of aeronautics we find the name Glenn Curtiss as one of the pioneer inventors of the airplane? He not only made a record as an inventor at the very beginning of the science of aeronautics but he organized a flying school and taught, at his own expense, men who are now prominent fliers in the service of the Army and the Navy.

I do not ask this consideration because of the affection I bear to one of the noblest women it has ever been my privilege to know, the mother of Glenn Curtiss, but I ask our Government to distinguish a man who has given unselfishly of his scientific service.

Mr. STAFFORD. For pay.

Mrs. OWEN. Not for pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not?

Mrs. OWEN. He gave his service in teaching these youths, as the gentleman will find from the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, his whole activity was based upon the dollar mark.

Mrs. OWEN. I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not? He formed a company that is still in existence and which has made millions and millions of dollars.

Mrs. OWEN. May I remind the gentleman that it is the Curtiss-Wright Co.? He is defending the Wright brothers.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the Wright brothers were pioneers in the field.

Mrs. OWEN. The pioneer service of Glenn Curtiss in this field was rendered at the same time as that of the Wright brothers.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. STAFFORD. No, no; the gentleman would spoil it.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman would spoil it, I say. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will not yield for me to ask a question, he is not exhibiting his usual courtesy. I am entitled to ask a question. I ask the gentleman to yield for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many times have I asked the distinguished gentleman from Texas to yield and he has declined?

Mr. BLANTON. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman for a question. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for an observation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the gentleman from Texas has been working very hard to-day on the floor. I know he is rather petulant, perhaps, but I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. That is right. [Laughter.] I want to ask the gentleman this——

Mr. STAFFORD. Not because of his threat.

Mr. BLANTON. No; because it is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; because it is TOM BLANTON.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is a man of business experience. The gentleman knows that in a business firm the name of the most important member is put first. For instance, it would be Stafford & Blanton. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. No; Blanton & Stafford. "B" comes before "S." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The company which was organized was called the "Curtiss-Wright Co." The Wright brothers recognized his standing, for they permitted Curtiss to put his name in front of theirs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, prior to the interpolation of the gentleman from Texas, I was about to say that I did not wish to be obdurate. In view of the fact the gentlewoman is accompanying me, though on a different path, in leaving this Chamber on March 4, she very likely will be honored by high political preferment by the incoming administration, which is her due, and based upon her worth, I will not object if it is not still insisted that the ribbons be attached to this flying cross. I think we are doing enough without awarding the accompanying ribbons.

Mrs. OWEN. I am very grateful for the concession of the gentleman. I shall be pleased to accept the amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill for the reasons given by my colleague from Wisconsin.

THE PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE & WASHINGTON RAILROAD CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 567, to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell, upon such terms and conditions as he considers advisable, to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., or its nominee, certain tracts of land adjacent to the right of way of said railroad company, situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland between Aberdeen and Magnolia stations of said railroad company, such tracts containing approximately 6 acres, more or less, and now forming parts of War Department reservations at Aberdeen Proving Ground, Edgewood Arsenal, and Fort Hoyle, which said tracts are no longer needed for military purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf, with and to the said the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., or its nominee, any and all contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate such sale; the net proceeds of the sale of the property hereinbefore designated to be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the fund known as the military post construction fund: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have the tracts of land appraised at the expense of the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co.: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall not sell the tracts of land for less consideration than the approved appraised value thereof and not less, in any event, than the sum of $3,759.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "Company," insert "and that the said railroad company shall replace any and all fences, and any other improvements on said property without expense to the Government: And provided further."

Page 2, line 22, insert "and not less, in any event, than the sum of $3,759."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JAMES J. MEANEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7174, for the relief of James J. Meaney.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James J. Meaney, who was a member of Company E, Eleventh Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States, as a member of that organization on the 30th day of November, 1902: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, after "1902," insert "and notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the act relating to pensions approved April 26, 1898, as amended by the act approved May 11, 1908: Provided."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EASEMENT FOR RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY IN POTTER COUNTY, TEX.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 11914, to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant an easement for railroad right of way over and upon a portion of the helium gas-bearing lands of the United States of America, in Potter County, in the State of Texas.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the report on this bill is very meager, and I would like to have the author of the bill, if he will, explain a little more the nature and purpose of the measure.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, it happened this way: At the time these lands were under negotiation as helium gas-bearing lands of the United States Government this branch line of the North Plains & Santa Fe Railway Co. from Amarillo, Tex., to Liberal, Kans., was under construction, and an option was held by the Government on these lands. Therefore the owner could not grant a right of way. Under the helium act the Government can grant only a revocable license.

In view of the time necessary to get all this straightened out and the desire to go ahead with the construction of the railway, they built the railway with simply a revocable license, and the company, naturally, wants to have the regular easement that is usually given for right-of-way purposes, a right which, under the helium act, could not be granted, hence the necessity for this bill which simply gives the right of way which is ordinarily given to railroad companies for the construction and operation of their lines.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman regards the purchase price as set out in this bill as adequate for this right of way?

Mr. JONES. Yes; in fact, this is more than the average price that was usual throughout that section for this purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we are granting a right of way to a railroad over lands which are used for Government purposes. I take it that the gentleman would have no objection to imposing upon the railroad company the obligation to assume all damages as the result of any injury that may occur to any person traveling on this right of way. I have prepared the following amendment:

SEC. 6. That the said North Plains & Santa Fe Railway Co., its successors and assigns, shall assume all obligations for any injury that any person may suffer on said right of way occasioned by the use of the adjoining lands by the Government of the United States.

Mr. JONES. I doubt if we could do that if the company were not negligent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes.

Mr. JONES. The company would be liable if it were negligent in any way.

Mr. STAFFORD. The railroad company is seeking a favor from the United States. We have possession of these lands and we want to use them. If any injury occurs here, let the railroad company take the consequences as to the damages that may result.

Mr. JONES. We reserve the right to go on there and use these lands for every purpose, and this only involves a right of way of 200 feet on each side.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the gentleman said 200 feet on each side, I thought that was a rather large width for a right of way, 400 feet, as customarily the right of way of a railroad is only 100 feet on each side.

Mr. JONES. In this particular section and for lands on which they may drill for oil and gas they do not want to go right up to the company's right of way.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is more reason for curtailing the right of way to the usual width of 100 feet rather than granting them 400 feet.

Mr. JONES. This was submitted by the department, and the Bureau of Mines wrote these provisions.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a protective measure.

Mr. JONES. Of course, if that amendment is put in, the bill will have to go back to the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a House bill.

Mr. JONES. I am going to ask unanimous consent to substitute a Senate bill, which is similar.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the railroad company should assume these obligations.

Mr. JONES. I would not have any objection to their assuming such obligations except I do not want to enact a bill that would impose an obligation on a railway company that might impair the validity of the bill. You can not impose upon a railway company an obligation to pay for damages that may occur in no way connected with the railway company.

Mr. STAFFORD. We could, if we wanted to, because they are asking our grace here. But, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there is a Senate bill, I shall not press the amendment which I have prepared.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute a similar Senate bill (S. 4576).

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, is the Senate bill identical?

Mr. JONES. Yes; it is identical.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey to North Plains & Santa Fe Railway Co., a railroad corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, its successors and assigns, an easement for railroad purposes over and upon the following-described property, being a part of certain helium gas bearing lands heretofore acquired by the United States of America, to wit: A strip of land 400 feet wide lying 200 feet each side of the center line of the main track of the North Plains & Sante Fe Railway Co. as said main track is now located and constructed over that part of survey No. 35, G. & M. survey block No. 5, conveyed to the United States of America by deed recorded on the 19th day of September, 1931, in volume 227, pages 221 and the following, of the deed records of Potter County, State of Texas, said strip of land containing an area of $13^{88}/_{100}$ acres, more or less.

SEC. 2. That the grantee shall pay the Government of the United States of America $13.87 per acre for the acreage contained in the right of way hereinbefore described.

SEC. 3. That the grantee, in further consideration for said easement, shall construct fences on each side of the right of way and maintain them in good condition.

SEC. 4. That the grant herein made shall be subject to the rights excepted and reserved to the Humble Oil & Refining Co. by the provisions of that certain warranty deed dated March 6, 1931, executed by said Humble Oil & Refining Co. to the United States of America, recorded September 19, 1931, in volume 227, pages 221 and the following, of the deed records of Potter County, Tex., and that certain working agreement between the Humble Oil & Refining Co. and the United States of America dated March 6, 1931, recorded September 19, 1931, in volume 224, pages 299 and the following, of said deed records.

SEC. 5. That the United States of America, its successors and assigns, shall have the unrestricted and unimpeded right to lay, maintain, inspect, and remove pipe lines for the transportation of oil, gas, and water, and lines for power and telephone, across said right of way at any and all times, and shall have the right to drill and operate oil and gas wells on said right of way at any location selected by the United States of America, its successors and assigns, except that while railroad tracks are actually in use thereon no well shall be drilled so close as to interfere with the operation of trains across said tracks; also that the grantee shall not unduly and unnecessarily interfere with the United States of America, its successors and assigns, in its use of said right of way.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 11914) was laid on the table.

WILLIAM A. REITHEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 598, for the relief of William A. Reithel.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I withhold it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object unless this bill is reduced. If the amount in the bill is reduced to about $1,500 for injuring this boy's foot way back in 1921 I shall not object. But $5,000 is entirely out of all reason.

Mr. PITTENGER. Let me say to my colleague that the committee very carefully considered the matter of damage.

There is an affidavit from this boy here. The War Department report is not correct. This boy had a crushed foot, and the big toe and three other toes were taken off. He is a cripple and is unable to work.

Mr. BLANTON. He has one toe remaining and part of his foot, according to his own statement.

Mr. PITTENGER. Yes; I admit that.

Mr. BLANTON. And we have fixed $5,000 as the limit in a death case, and, in addition to all this, the Government truck was not to blame.

Mr. PITTENGER. I differ from my colleague.

Mr. BLANTON. The War Department says it was not. The truck was being driven carefully just 6 miles an hour, so the War Department certifies, after its complete investigation in 1921.

Mr. PITTENGER. Let me say to the gentleman that he does not always follow these department reports.

Mr. BLANTON. I think those of the War Department are nearly always reliable.

Mr. PITTENGER. But the report is in error here.

Mr. BLANTON. When the War Department investigates a matter its report is nearly always reliable.

Mr. PITTENGER. Sometimes they are, but not always; and let me say to my colleague that it is not negligence for an adult or a 9-year-old boy to go across an intersection behind a truck, but it is negligence to release a truck and let it roll back on a man's foot.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman must not change the facts, because this boy was 10 years old and not 9.

Mr. PITTENGER. That is an error. I think it was nine years.

Mr. BLANTON. And the War Department says the truck never did stop, and that it was going 6 miles an hour, being driven very carefully.

Mr. PITTENGER. They had to protect this driver of the truck, because they did not want to court-martial him.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will never get this bill through at any more than $1,500 for an injured foot, because we have rules here to go by and we have certain precedents that we are not going to change.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I am going to object to this bill, because there is not any evidence in the report which would justify the awarding of anything whatever.

There is no evidence showing any negligence whatever.

Mr. PITTENGER. There certainly is all the evidence in the world.

Mr. BLANTON. This was a boy 10 years old. He could not under the law be guilty of contributory negligence.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The only substantial evidence of the claim is this person 19 years old recalling what happened when he was 10 years old to support his claim of $20,000, and it is not entitled to full belief.

Mr. BLANTON. The War Department says that the truck ran over the boy's foot, and he has had to have a part of it amputated.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. The case is entitled to our sympathy, but I can see no evidence of negligence on the part of the driver to justify the payment of damages.

Mr. BLACK. There was negligence on the part of somebody.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. It was the rear wheels of the truck that ran over the boy's foot, and nobody knew what had happened. The statement of the War Department says:

> The records of the War Department show that on February 9, 1921, United States Government truck E-9 while turning off of Fifty-eighth Street into Third Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., struck and injured William Reithel, a boy then about 10 years of age, causing serious injury to his right foot which resulted in the amputation of the first and third toes.
>
> The accident was investigated by the survey officer of the Brooklyn general intermediate depot, whose findings are in part as follows:
> "That on February 9, 1921, electric truck E-9 was proceeding east on Fifty-eighth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., at a rate of speed not exceeding 6 miles an hour, on slushy streets; and that truck was on official business.
> "That at the same time William Reithel was walking across Third Avenue at Fifty-eighth Street in a westerly direction.
> "That electric truck E-9 turned south into Third Avenue and rear wheel passed over the foot of William Reithel.
> "That driver of the electric truck No. E-9 did not see William Reithel and was unaware that an accident had occurred.
> "That William Reithel suffered injury to the right foot, necessitating the amputation of the great toe and a probable further amputation of the entire right foot, resulting in a disability of 25 per cent.
> "That this accident was due to the probable skidding of electric truck No. E-9 on a slippery street, causing the rear wheel to pass over William Reithel's foot.
>
> "That driver of electric truck was proceeding in a careful manner and should not be held responsible for this accident.
> "That William Reithel, on account of his age, can not be found guilty of contributory negligence."

In other words, this boy was in the rear of the truck and no doubt slipped. If the same thing had happened where a private individual owned the truck, if the gentleman was attorney for the private individual, he would not recommend any settlement. There is no evidence of any negligence.

Mr. BLACK. The statement of the claimant is that he was crossing behind the truck and the driver released his brakes and the truck rolled backward over his foot.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. That was the statement of the boy when he was 19 years old trying to recall what happened when he was 10 years old.

Mr. BLACK. The War Department does not find him guilty of negligence.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. And it does not find the driver guilty of negligence.

Mr. BLACK. There is no doubt but that the boy was injured, and that he has had to have a partial amputation of the foot.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. It was an accident, and we have, of course, sympathy for the boy, but I do not feel that we should pay money out of the Federal Treasury in the absence of any evidence of negligence on the part of the driver.

Mr. PITTENGER. There are other affidavits submitted here. We could have taken evidence, and followed another course of procedure, but in making the report the committee considered all the other affidavits and evidence. We have the report of the department here and all the facts.

Here is a man driving a truck, and he came to this intersection. Here is a boy, 10 years old, who, passing behind the truck when the driver released his brakes and the truck rolled back over his foot. I say that is negligence on the part of the driver. Of course, the War Department is trying to protect the driver. I say this claim is a meritorious claim.

This claim is a meritorious claim. It may be that my colleague from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is right in wanting to reduce the amount. I do not agree with him. However, that is a matter of individual judgment. I do submit, however, there is evidence of negligence.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. No evidence is referred to except the self-serving declaration of the man who makes the claim for $20,000.

Mr. SCHAFER. Oh, the War Department indicates that the injury was probably due to the skidding of the truck.

Mr. SWICK. Was the boy crossing at a street intersection?

Mr. PITTENGER. Yes.

Mr. SWICK. Then the truck must have been, of necessity, partly to blame. The boy had a right to be there.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. I concede that the boy had a right to be there, but I can see no evidence whatever of the negligent handling of the truck, and in the absence of that I think there would be no liability upon the part of a private defendant, and there is no liability whatever upon the part of the Federal Government, and there would be none on the part of a municipality. This man was acting in a governmental function.

Mr. PITTENGER. I think there was negligence in releasing the truck and letting it go back.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Oh, if the witnesses were before the gentleman's committee and had been subjected to cross-examination, and if the Government witnesses were called and were subjected to cross-examination we might get some evidence. Also I remind gentlemen that this is also another one of those claims arising in New York City about 12 years ago. Why has no action been taken upon this before?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Action has not been taken because in each session of Congress there are three or four or five thousand bills introduced, and in the last session of this Congress and in this session the members of this committee have worked from 14 to 15 hours a day to consider the work of the committee. There are thousands of claims in the committee now, meritorious claims, that have not been reached.

Mr. PITTENGER. And that can not be reached.

Mr. SCHAFER. And that can not be reached.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. If it has waited 12 years it can wait another year. Before I consent to this bill I want to see some evidence of negligence upon the part of the truck.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman realizes that as time goes on it is harder to get evidence.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ST. LUDGERS CATHOLIC CHURCH OF GERMANTOWN, MO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2103) for the relief of St. Ludgers Catholic Church of Germantown, Henry County, Mo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I do not find any report from any of the departments. I think this is one of those hoary Civil War claim bills.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; to ascertain why some department of the Government has not made a report upon the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I have not in my hand all the data that was before the War Claims Committee, and I do not recall any report from the Government in opposition to the bill. I introduced this bill, or a similar bill, many years ago. This is to pay damages for the occupancy of what is known as St. Ludgers Catholic Church, of Germantown, Henry County, Mo., the county in which I live. I am familiar with the facts in regard to the case. This case has been reported unanimously, after full hearing, time and again. The latest report was made by Mr. HARE, the chairman of the committee. I hold that report in my hand, and it reads as hereinafter inserted.

Mr. SCHAFER. O Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can extend his remarks in the RECORD. What I want to get is a few facts in answer to a few questions. Is this church operated at the present time in the same identity that it occupied at the time of the Civil War, when property was destroyed?

Mr. DICKINSON. No. I was coming to that.

Mr. SCHAFER. Who is going to get these funds?

Mr. DICKINSON. The same people who had to go ahead and build a new church in the same place and who now are in this community.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then the funds will go to the same congregation?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; the same congregation.

Mr. SCHAFER. I want to ask one more question and perhaps we can get together on this matter. The report indicates that the Union soldiers had taken possession of it, and part of the claim is by reason of the soldiers shooting through the roof of the church. Certainly the Union soldiers in a church would not be responsible for shooting through the roof of the church if they took refuge there. Any claim for that should come from the other side.

Mr. DICKINSON. The main part of the claim is for the occupation by the Iowa and Missouri Federal regiments during the years 1862, 1863, and 1864, when they took possession of the church and occupied it in that territory, and incidental to their occupancy they damaged it by shooting through it, broke the windows, and otherwise damaged the building and broke up the congregation for the period of said occupancy.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is fully convinced that the evidence before the committee indicated that there is liability upon the part of the Federal Government in the amount incorporated in the bill?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. If we get by the objection phase, will the gentleman accept an amendment providing that there will be no attorney fees connected with it?

Mr. DICKINSON. No attorney fees on earth. I introduced this bill each time it was introduced except when I went out in 1928, and my successor, Mr. Halsey, introduced the bill, and the report was made, and I hold it in my hand, by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

In one affidavit made by a man of the highest character, a man whom I have known for 50 years, J. B. Schmedding, this statement is made as a part of his affidavit:

> I am familiar with the affairs of the community. To their knowledge, every member of said church was a loyal supporter of the Union during the Civil War and thereafter.

Other affidavits of proof of facts I hold in my hand as made by Joe Schmedding, John J. Cook, J. B. Greube, all men of high character. No dispute as to the facts or liability of the Government.

It was a little German community. It was a little Catholic community. They had this church. An Iowa regiment and a Missouri regiment occupied it for three years. It broke up the congregation. They separated and did not come together until 1865. When I came to Congress in 1910 there were pending bills covering similar character of claims, introduced by my distinguished predecessor, David De Armond. Those claims, reintroduced by me, were in an omnibus bill, and was passed without any difficulty. The proof had not been gotten together on this bill until I came to Congress, and I introduced the bill and I have introduced it time and again, and Mr. Halsey, my Republican successor, introduced it, and Mr. HOOPER reported it. I want the privilege of reading into the RECORD both the Hare and Hooper reports. They are short, but clearly state the facts. Will you listen to me while I read them?

I do not talk often before this House. I am interested in this bill because of its great merit. There is no question about the justice of it. The Federal troops occupied this church in this village community, where the border warfare was fierce. Some of the fiercest conflicts of the Civil War were enacted there in that border warfare, and many homes and buildings were burned, and churches were used for shelter of Union troops. These Federal troops occupied this church in this little community and held it for nearly three long years. They broke up the congregation; and afterwards, when it was incidentally damaged and partially destroyed, then the same congregation went ahead and built a new church, and they came together; and that splendid community, from the day I introduced this bill 20 years ago, has been hoping that the Government, through the Congress, would pay this just bill. I have come here time and again at night. I came here six years ago and stayed until this bill was reached, when the adjournment hour came, and then it was in the closing hours of the session and could not be reached. It went over. I introduced it again. Mr. Halsey introduced it. Mr. HARE says in this report:

> Bills have been introduced time and again, commencing many years ago, asking for compensation for the use and occupation of and incidental damages to said church, but consideration was delayed by the World War and other conditions.
> In view of the above facts, your committee unanimously recommends that the bill do pass as amended.

[House Report No. 1295, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

ST. LUDGERS CATHOLIC CHURCH, GERMANTOWN, HENRY COUNTY, MO.

Mr. HARE, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 2103:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2103) entitled "A bill for the relief of St. Ludgers Catholic Church, of Germantown, Henry County, Mo.," having considered the same report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The facts in this case are fully set forth in Report No. 143 of the Seventy-first Congress, second session, which is appended hereto and made a part hereof.

[House Report No. 143, Seventy-first Congress, second session]

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2695) entitled 'A bill for the relief of St. Ludgers Catholic Church, Germantown, Henry County, Mo.,' having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

"A similar bill was introduced in the Seventieth Congress, and favorably reported by your committee.

"The facts are fully set forth in House Report No. 2767, Seventieth Congress, second session, which is appended hereto and made a part of this report."

[House Report No. 2767, Seventieth Congress, second session]

ST. LUDGERS CATHOOLIC CHURCH, GERMANTOWN, HENRY COUNTY, MO.

Mr. HOOPER, from the Committee on War Claims, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 15766):

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15766) entitled 'A bill for the relief of St. Ludgers Catholic Church, Germantown, Henry County, Mo.,' having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with an amendment striking out in line 7 of the bill the figures '$6,000' and inserting therein the figures '$3,000.'

"The evidence in this case, given by witnesses having personal knowledge of the facts, shows that St. Ludgers Catholic Church at Germantown, Henry County, Mo., was taken possession of and occupied by Government troops of the United States Army during the Civil War during the years 1862, 1863, and part of 1864; that said troops were quartered in said church, which was by them used for cooking and sleeping and commissary purposes, and that during the time it was so occupied it was greatly damaged by said use, and by the troops shooting through the roof and into the walls of the interior of the building; that the communion rail, benches, altar, and fixtures and interior decorations of the church were ruined; and that said troops dug a well near the northwest corner of the church building, causing the walls to crack and break; that it continued to be so damaged and difficult to repair; that such occupation interrupted the holding of services therein during said period, disrupted the congregation, destroyed the organization during that time, and caused the parish school to be broken up. The troops occupying said building were the First Iowa troops, and later the Seventh Missouri, Company H, were quartered in said church, and no services were held therein while said troops occupied said church, and not until 1865 were religious services resumed.

"Bills have been introduced time and again, commencing many years ago, asking for compensation for the use and occupation of and incidental damages to said church, but consideration was delayed by the World War and other conditions.

"In view of the above facts your committee unanimously recommends that the bill do pass as amended."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, for the reason stated, I object.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in my remarks the reports made by Mr. HOOPER and by Mr. HARE. They are both short reports, stating the facts in regard to this matter. No more meritorious bill was ever presented, and the Government ought to pay it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON]?

There was no objection.

The other report was made by Congressman HARE.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will not object if the gentleman will accept an amendment providing for no attorney's fees.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes. I will accept that because there are no attorney fees in connection with this matter. Every dollar will go to the church.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, in the last Congress there were four or five bills dating back to old Civil War days, and among others this bill. It was stated that it was not the policy of the Committee on War Claims to report bills relating to matters arising out of the Civil War. This is the only bill that has been reported at this term from the War Claims Committee referring to damages away back in Civil War days. I examined the bill then, and I think I recall having objected to the bill in the last Congress when Mr. Halsey introduced it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I reserve the right to object and to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In the last Congress we passed a bill, introduced by the late Percy Quin, for $33,000, for a Civil War claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not recall that. I must have had a stroke of apoplexy when that bill was under consideration.

Mr. DICKINSON. I hold in my hand affidavits made by worthy and prominent citizens whom I know and who lived in that community during the period, who were members of this church, who furnished the evidence in this case.

JOANNA A. SHEEHAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8879, for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, in favor of Joanna A. Sheehan, of Haverhill, Mass., United States Liberty loan permanent coupon bond No. 321,498 in the denomination of $1,000, of the third 4¼'s, issued May 9, 1918, matured September 15, 1928, with interest from the date of issue to the date of maturity, at the rate of 4¼ per cent per annum, without presentation of said bond, the said bond, together with coupons due September 15, 1922, to September 15, 1928, inclusive, attached, having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said bond shall not have been previously presented and paid, and that payment shall not be made hereunder for any coupons which shall have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said Joanna A. Sheehan shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of the said Liberty loan bond and the unpaid interest which had accrued thereon when the principal became due and payable, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the Liberty loan bond or the coupons thereof hereinbefore described:

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "described," insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GLENN H. CURTISS, DECEASED

Mrs. OWEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 754, H. R. 11980, authorizing the President to make a posthumous award of a distinguished-flying cross to Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased, and to present the same to Lua Curtiss, mother of the said Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, the lady has no objection to striking out "of appropriate design with accompanying ribbons."

Mrs. OWEN. I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to make a posthumous award of a distinguished-flying cross of appropriate design with accompanying ribbons to Glenn H. Curtiss for distinguished service in the development of American aviation. The distinguished-flying cross shall be presented to Lua Curtiss, mother of the said Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 4, after the word "cross," strike out the words "of appropriate design with accompanying ribbons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A. C. MESSLER CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 439, for the relief of A. C. Messler Co.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CONDON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Gladly.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Speaker, this claim is a war claim. It was very carefully considered by the Senate committee that had it under consideration in the last session. It was given very exhaustive consideration by the Senator from Maine, Senator WHITE, who went into the matter very thoroughly.

It appears from the report that this matter was very exhaustively considered by the Committee on War Claims of the House, and after serious consideration they have unanimously agreed with the unanimous report of the Senate committee. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, the only objection there could possibly be to the allowance of this claim is the statement of the Secretary of War contained in his letter dated February 1, 1932, which appears in the report of the Senate, in which he says that in view of the past actions of the department he could not give approval to the claim. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the last sentence which indicates that even the department is not convinced its action against this claim is entirely justified. If it was so convinced, this last sentence would not have been put in the letter by the Secretary of War. He states:

However, no objection would be interposed by this department to a bill permitting the claimant company to present its case to the Court of Claims.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, this indicates very clearly the War Department is not absolutely convinced that equity is on the side of the Government. It indicates a feeling on the part of officials in the War Department that there is equity on the part of the claimants.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that the Dent Board, when it was in existence, signed a unanimous report to pay this man the sum of $16,000, speaking in round numbers. The Comptroller of the Treasury refused to sign the check when it got to him. It was purely an arbitrary action. The committee has documents in proof of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAVICCHIA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will read the report he will find from the letter of the Secretary of War, which I read very carefully, and the opinion of the chairman of the Claims Board, that it was considered and denied by the Claims Board, Ordnance Department, and by the Board of Contract Adjustment. The latter board denied the claim. Under the terms of the contract the Government was obligated to furnish only 17 pounds of metal per 1,000 clips manufactured. An appeal was taken under the Dent Act, and on December 4, 1920, the decision of the Board of Contract Adjustment denying relief was affirmed and approved.

Mr. CAVICCHIA. That is not so, because the documents in the possession of the War Claims Committee contain the original copy signed by the members of the Dent Board recommending the payment of this money.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have the official record:

The claim has been considered and denied by the Claims Board, Ordnance Department, and by the War Department Board of Contract Adjustment (6 Dec. W. D. Bd. of Contr. Adj. 504). The latter board denied the claim on the theory that, under the terms of the contract, the Government was obligated to furnish only 17 pounds of metal per 1,000 clips manufactured. An appeal was taken to the Secretary of War, as authorized under the Dent Act (40 Stat. 1272), who, on December 4, 1920, affirmed and approved the decision of the Board of Contract Adjustment denying relief (8 Dec. Appeal Sec., W. D. Cls. Bd. 221). Apparently the case has never been before the Court of Claims.

Now, then, if there is such a statement as that referred to by the gentleman, it should be incorporated in the report. I am basing my objection on the showing made by the report. Therefore, I object.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have given this claim some study. It was brought to my attention a year ago. I think the gentleman overlooks the crux of the whole matter. Irrespective of what it said in the report which the gentleman just read, the whole thing comes down to whether or not the words "without cost to the contractor" were included in the contract.

The contract which the contractor received and presented to the board which heard the matter had those words in it. The Government said these words were stricken out. There is no question that those words, "without cost to the contractor," were in the copy of contract which the contractor had. That is admitted all through the proceedings.

Mr. STAFFORD. This contract was made in quadruplicate.

Mr. O'CONNOR. However that may be, the man had in his hand a contract which said "without cost to the contractor." Now, the mere fact the Government might have had another contract in which those words were stricken out should not bind the contractor.

I believe this is one of the most meritorious claims that has come before the House, and that a great injustice is done in the matter because the Government takes advantage of the slip of a typewriting machine instead of giving the contractor his rights under the contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. These three boards that passed upon these matters did not take advantage of any claimant.

Mr. O'CONNOR. They certainly did.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not make me believe that.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

LAKE OF THE WOODS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 11971, to fulfill certain treaty obligations with respect to water levels of the Lake of the Woods.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the counterpart of this bill, Senate Joint Resolution 124, is on the Consent Calendar. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

HARRY C. ANDERSON

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 733, the bill (H. R. 4395) for the relief of Harry C. Anderson. When we reached this bill we had mistaken it for another bill and I ask to return to it for that reason. There is really no objection to it, so far as we are concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Harry C. Anderson, who was a member of Battery C, Twentieth Field Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 17th day of January, 1920: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "pension," strike out the words "or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act" and insert the words "allowance or any payment provided under the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, the World War adjusted compensation act, 1924, as amended, or other benefit whatsoever to which said person may be or become entitled by law, shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, there should be an amendment to make the bill conform to the usual language by striking out in line 7, the word "honorably," and after the word "discharged," inserting "under honorable conditions." I offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado: Page 1, line 7, strike out the word "honorably," and after the word "discharged" insert the words "under honorable conditions."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MARY E. RONEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2453, for the relief of Mary E. Roney.

Mr. GRISWOLD and Mr. HANCOCK of New York reserved the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object ultimately, but if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] wants to make a speech, I shall withhold the objection; but ultimately I am going to object, because this good woman has already received $5,000 in cash from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and we have a long-established precedent here that we will not allow more than $5,000 on any death claim.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask for the regular order, if there is going to be objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, George H. Roney, on the 30th of October, 1930, was on his way home from work, in the peace of God and the city of Washington, when he was struck down and to death by a recklessly driven automobile on the wrong side of the road and under the command of two police-patrol officers of the District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia recognizing, without lawsuit, its legal obligation under the circumstances, paid the widow $5,000. That is the legal maximum permitted in the municipality. If there is a Member of this House who thinks his widow should be entitled to no more than $5,000 under these circumstances, let him object.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I do not yield. You have said you are going to object peremptorily, Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to you, sir, that although you have such peremptory power to object here and power is magnificent, to use it in the fashion you are doing on this widow woman and her helpless child——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to permit that kind of argument here.

Mr. LEWIS. You will permit in the five minutes I speak such statements I think it proper and just to make.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can not attack me in that way. I make the point that we have no quorum here.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not yield to the gentleman. I have made no attack upon the gentleman whatever. I have described——

Mr. BLANTON. I just want the gentleman to understand that he can not thus unjustly attack me.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not yield, Mr. BLANTON, under the circumstances.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will not yield, and therefore I make the point of no quorum. There is a little handful of us who have sat here two hours and a half to attend to the Nation's business and the gentleman has no right to attack me and not yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say, in response to the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland has been recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I can make the point of no quorum even so.

Mr. PARKS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not fair. I can not answer him because I have no time. I insist that he should yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I now yield to the gentleman for a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. I wanted to state to my friend, calmly and without any feeling, that we have established a precedent here in this House that not over $5,000 shall be paid on any death claim. This good woman has already received $5,000 in cash. There are several men on this floor who will object to the gentleman's claim, and yet he is attacking me as if I were doing something here improper and out of the ordinary.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Texas is absolutely in error. At this session the Congress suspended the rules and paid $15,000 each in the case of the death of two Mexican nationals who were shot by law-enforcement agents who were afterward acquitted by a jury of their peers. The gentleman made a speech for this appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. That was an international case.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman thinks it is all right to pay $15,000 each to Mexican greasers and has not the same consideration for this widow and her helpless child.

Mr. BLANTON. I resent them being called Mexican greasers. They were Mexicans, it is true; but they were school boys from good families in the Republic of Mexico and were on a lawful, a proper mission—to wit, returning home from school—and were entitled to the protection of our Government. They were murdered in cold blood, without any excuse or justification, within our borders over a thousand miles from their home; and when you consider the expense their families were put to in having their bodies returned to Mexico and given decent burial in their home cemetery, there was left very little of the amount allowed by our Government. Our United States and the United States of Mexico are friends, and each appreciates the friendship of the other.

We should be willing to yield something for the good will of the great Republic of Mexico to the south of us.

Mr. SCHAFER. And you ought to yield something to this widow and her little child.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, that bellicose talk is not going to affect me. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum, as long as the gentleman from Maryland has yielded to me, and I want him to talk as long as he pleases.

Mr. LEWIS. The implication of the gentleman from Texas that I "want to talk" is totally unjustified. I want to say that I wish I did have eloquence adequate to bring to the Members of this House the vivid sense of justice that ought to prevail in a matter of this kind. My God, think of the precedent which would say that this widow and her babe shall receive no more than $5,000! What a denial of justice, a denial of justice only possible to arise with an omnipotent and irresponsible power.

What is this case? All the facts are admitted. Here are two officers flying at 40 to 50 miles on the wrong side of the road. This man was struck down on his right of way, throwing his body some 60 feet.

This woman could not bring suit against these transgressors of the rules of safety and prudence on the highway. They were municipal officers. If she could have sued them, do you think the verdict would have been a paltry $5,000? Would a jury have considered that just compensation? It would have been more like $25,000 or $30,000.

We are told here this evening—not without challenge, however—that the precedents in this House have fixed upon $5,000 as the limit. Gentlemen of the House, I do not believe there has ever been any such precedent. It is too unjust, too brutal a denial of justice to a widow and her helpless child. Gentlemen, do with this measure what you please, I have discharged my duty.

MONUMENTAL STEVEDORE CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1169) for the relief of the Monumental Stevedore Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The committee on this particular bill, which originally was a bill giving the right to sue in the Court of Claims, has added an amendment making the bill a straight appropriation.

Mr. PITTENGER. I told the gentleman why we did that.

Mr. HOPE. I would like to have the gentleman explain that, and, if he can, advise us as to the action which the committee took in determining the amount.

Mr. PITTENGER. The Treasury Department shows that that was the amount of damages, and instead of having them go to court over a small amount like this, waste the time of the Government and the Government attorneys and put the Government and the claimant to the expense, the committee decided that we better pay them in a lump sum, otherwise it would all be eaten up in attorney fees.

Mr. HOPE. The committee had before it the evidence showing the exact amount of damages.

Mr. PITTENGER. We got it in the report from the commandant, W. V. E. Jacobs.

Mr. HOPE. That report says that the damage is approximately $600. It does not itemize the damages or state what they consisted of. The committee itself has fixed the amount of the damages at $677.75. I assume that the committee must have had some evidence before it.

Mr. PITTENGER. I have not looked at the files lately, but my recollection is that there was a lot of bulky testimony and itemized statements submitted there.

Mr. HOPE. Is the gentleman himself, who wrote the report, and who I know was familiar with the matter at that time, satisfied as to the amount of the claim?

Mr. PITTENGER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of the right to object, I understand there is a general law which permits the department officials to pay up to $1,000—$500 in some cases and $1,000 in others. Why did not this claimant avail itself of that privilege?

Mr. PITTENGER. I am not sure that there is a law of that kind. The Secretary of the Treasury does not indicate that in his report, on page 2. I do not know just what the reason for it is, but they have to come to Congress for permission to sue.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know that as far as the Secretary of the Navy is concerned he has authority to settle damage suits of some kind up to $500 and others up to $1,000. However, as I now recollect the law, I do not think that extends to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PITTENGER. I do not think so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read the committee amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the United States, the sum of $677.75 to Monumental Stevedore Co., of Baltimore, Md., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Maryland, owner of lighter No. 1, on account of damages caused to said lighter by collision therewith of United States Coast Guard cutter Winnesimmet in the Patapsco River on the 17th day of September, 1923."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorney-fee proviso.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: At the end of the bill insert the following proviso: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

G. C. VANDOVER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11150) for the relief of G. C. Vandover.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Can the gentleman from Missouri make a statement about this?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the report speaks for itself.

Mr. BACHMANN. It does not speak for itself in so far as liability is concerned. I am having trouble with the bill because it looks now as though the liability is on the part of the State rather than on the part of the Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this soldier was sent to the Farmington (Mo.) Insane Asylum, which is a State institution. At that time the Government had no place to send a man who was insane. The Government paid the State of Missouri through this institution for the upkeep of this man, as shown by page 3 of the report.

Mr. BACHMANN. The Government is paying the keep of the soldier in this State hospital and then the soldier ran away.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. He was a veteran soldier patient.

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The soldier got away, and the man went to his home in De Soto, which is a short distance from Farmington. They sent word to the insane asylum that they had the man there. The superintendent sent the bookkeeper over to get him, and when he went into the house the man took up a shotgun and shot off the man's leg. He was a Veterans' Bureau patient. It was not the fault of Mr. Vandover that the man escaped. He was a bookkeeper, but he was sent after him by the superintendent.

Mr. BACHMANN. But he was an employee of the State, acting in the performance of his duty for the State at the time.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. He was performing his duty as a bookkeeper in that institution, obeying the order of the superintendent who had charge of the institution.

Mr. BACHMANN. His duties as bookkeeper did not require him to go out——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Well, I think the gentleman's objection is rather technical. This man was a soldier, and the Government had no place to send him, and the State accepted him, and the man ran away and escaped. When they went after him to bring him back they did not send for the Government to send a man to get him.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it not a fact that the Government was the guardian of this insane soldier ward?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Absolutely. They were paying the man.

Mr. BACHMANN. But if this man had been an employee of the Government he would have come under the Federal compensation law.

Mr. SCHAFER. If he had been a private citizen, what law would he have come under?

Mr. BACHMANN. Does not the State of Missouri have compensation laws to cover such cases?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. No. It did not have then. It has now. The law was enacted in 1920.

Mr. BACHMANN. Has the State done anything on this claim?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Nothing whatever.

Mr. BACHMANN. Was there any application ever made to the State?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Oh, no. No application was made that I know of.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me it is a matter for the State to undertake rather than the Federal Government. It is a fundamental principle that the State should bear the burden rather than that the National Government should bear the burden.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BRUMM. Was the man placed there by the Federal Government in a State institution?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. He was placed there by the Government.

Mr. BRUMM. Then the Federal Government is liable.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The Federal Government had no hospital to which it could send the man. They had no place where they could send an insane patient.

Mr. BACHMANN. What I am trying to get across——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I understand what the gentleman is trying to get across. He wants to tack it onto the State.

Mr. BACHMANN. Where a man is employed by the State and he is injured in the performance of his duty, the States take care of it. He was performing a duty as an official of that hospital, for the State, and he was injured in the performance of his duty. As I understand the laws of the different States, where a man is injured in the performance of his duty the State is liable in the first instance.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman take into consideration the fact that when a Government ward escaped from the hospital they did not send to Washington to have a man sent out to capture him. They sent the bookkeeper out to capture him, and when he went into the house the man grabbed a shotgun and shot his leg off. This is a meritorious claim.

Mr. BACHMANN. I understand, as far as the injury is concerned, it is a meritorious claim; but we have no way of knowing what the State of Missouri has done until the gentleman tells us about it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am advised the State has done nothing.

Mr. BACHMANN. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] that the State had no compensation laws at the time, and the man was not compensated, and in view of the fact that he was a soldier, I am inclined to let the bill pass.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I assure the gentleman there was no State law governing the matter at the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to G. C. Vandover the sum of $20,000. Such sum is in full compensation for injuries sustained by G. C. Vandover, who, while acting within his capacity as an employee of State Hospital No. 4, Farmington, Mo., had his right leg shot off by a discharged soldier, then a patient in such hospital and a Federal Government charge.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "$20,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: At the end of the bill insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, February 17, 1933.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

942. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation submitted by the Secretary of War in the sum of $255,500, fiscal year 1933, for the payment of claims of certain British nationals in the amounts awarded them by the Commission for Adjustment of British Claims (H. ## PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

10462. By Mr. ANDREWS of New York: Petition of the Philathea, Waldorf, and Men's Bible Classes of the Plymouth Methodist Episcopal Church; Women's Missionary Society of the St. James Evangelical Church, and Women's Circle of the Bethlehem Presbyterian Church, Buffalo; Union Bible Class of the First Methodist Episcopal Church and LaSalle Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Niagara Falls, all of the State of New York, protesting against the return of beer and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

10463. By Mr. CLARKE of New York: Petition of Merritt E. Mead, of Binghamton, N. Y., requesting action on the revaluation of the gold ounce to double its present value, work for the elimination of abuses associated with mass productionism, and giving President power to reduce and abolish unnecessary Government expense; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

10464. Also, petition of Samuel M. Griffiths and James Boyd Griffiths, of Binghamton, N. Y., requesting earliest possible action on the revaluation of the gold ounce, the correction of the financial abuses bearing on the present financial crisis, and the elimination of the abuses associated with mass production; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10465. By Mr. CRAIL: Petition of I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, Calif., setting forth a plan for regulated reflation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

10466. Also, petition of A. E. Esilman, of Los Angeles, Calif., setting forth a 3-point legislative program for betterment of unemployment and economic distress, particularly as these matters are affected by aliens living in America; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

10467. By Mr. LAMBERTSON: Resolution of the Reserve Officers' Club of Topeka, Kans., urging that Congress give more than ordinary consideration to the recommendations of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and all other public officials who are directly responsible for the maintenance of our national defense, in order that the efficiency and morale of the military and naval forces may be maintained during the present world crisis; to the Committee on Appropriations.

10468. By Mr. LINDSAY: Petition of Fleet Reserve Association, through Cornelius E. Anderson, national president, Brooklyn, N. Y., concerning House bill 13520, the Treasury-

Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on Appropriations.

10469. Also, petition of Donald N. Dockrell Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Newington, Conn., opposing the Bratton amendment; to the Committee on Appropriations.

10470. By Mr. McFADDEN: Petition of 40 engineers, firemen, and trainmen of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., transportation department, Sayre, Pa., favoring a 5-day week, which they feel will be no additional cost to the railroad company, but will mean an equalization of work among the employees; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

10471. By Mr. MILLARD: Petition presented at the request of residents of Westchester County, N. Y., urging legislation for the revaluation of the gold ounce; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

10472. Also, petition presented at the request of the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union at Mamaroneck and Larchmont, N. Y., protesting against the so-called beer bill and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

10473. Also, petition presented at the request of the members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Suffern, N. Y., protesting against the so-called beer bill and the repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

10474. By Mr. RUDD: Petition of Queens Chapter, No. 26, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Flushing, Long Island, N. Y., protesting against any legislation proposed or anticipated that will affect veterans' benefits; to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

10475. By Mr. SHREVE: Petition of J. H. Anderson and 14 other citizens of Erie County, Pa., asking for the passage of the stop-alien-representation amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

10476. By Mr. SWICK: Petition of Mrs. E. W. Morrow, 208 North Walnut Street, New Castle, Pa., president, and Mrs. Ellis White, Harlansburg, secretary, and members of the Croton Woman's Christian Temperance Union, New Castle, Lawrence County, Pa., indorsing Senate bill 1079 and Senate Resolution 170, providing for a Federal motion-picture commission to regulate and supervise the motion-picture industry; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

10477. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Samuel Dickstein, requesting an investigation of the conduct of George Z. Medalie, United States attorney for New York, and his office; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1933

(Legislative day of Friday, February 10, 1933)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. BLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for the approval of the Journal and to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for that purpose.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the approval of the Journal for the calendar days of Wednesday and Thursday, February 15 and 16, 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HALE] owing to the death of his brother.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that my colleague the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My colleague [Mr. WHEELER] is absent owing to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained on official business of the Senate.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is detained on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. COPELAND] is necessarily absent from the Senate because of the death of his father. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SCHALL] is unavoidably absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 4576) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant an easement for railroad right of way over and upon a portion of the helium-gas bearing lands of the United States of America, in Potter County, in the State of Texas.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1705) for the relief of Samuel C. Davis, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 567) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 637. An act to relinquish the title of the United States to certain lands in the county of Los Angeles, State of California;

H. R. 1169. An act for the relief of the Monumental Stevedore Co.;

H. R. 2601. An act for the relief of William Mathew Squires;

H. R. 2803. An act for the relief of John S. Stotts, deceased;

H. R. 3969. An act for the relief of John P. Leonard;

H. R. 4395. An act for the relief of Harry C. Anderson;

H. R. 6933. An act for the relief of Zoe A. Tilghman;

H. R. 7174. An act for the relief of James J. Meaney;

H. R. 7986. An act for the relief of William N. Fishburn;

H. R. 8879. An act for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan;

H. R. 10070. An act for the relief of Beryl M. McHam;

H. R. 11150. An act for the relief of G. C. Vandover; and

H. R. 11980. An act authorizing the President to make a posthumous award of a distinguished-flying cross to Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased, and to present the same to Lua Curtiss, mother of the said Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

STATE OF IDAHO,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Franklin Girard, secretary of state of the State of Idaho, and legal custodian of the original enrolled copies of all acts passed at the various sessions of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed constitutes a full, true, and complete transcript of the original enrolled copy of Senate Joint Memorial No. 4, enacted by the twenty-second session of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, and filed in this office the 13th day of February, 1933.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Boise, the capital of Idaho, this 13th day of February, A. D. 1933.

[SEAL.]

FRANKLIN GIRARD,
Secretary of State.

IN THE SENATE.

Senate Joint Memorial 4 (by Kirkpatrick and Donart)

A joint memorial to the honorable Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

Received and filed February 13, 1933.

FRANKLIN GIRARD,
Secretary of State.

IN THE SENATE.

Senate Joint Memorial 4 (by Kirkpatrick and Donart)

A joint memorial to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent: That—

Whereas by reason of the great depreciation in the price of farm products and the inability of farmers to market the products of their farms in an amount to equal the cost of production, irrigation districts, duly organized and existing in conformity with the laws of the State wherein such districts are situate, and which districts were organized at the request of, and under contracts made with, the Secretary of the Interior for the purposes of management and for the purposes of collecting and paying the costs of constructing irrigation works by the Department of Reclamation of the Government of the United States, are unable to collect the assessments for the operation and maintenance of such irrigation district canals and diversion works and to pay the costs incurred in the diversion and distribution of the water to farms in such districts; and

Whereas by reason of said inability to collect such assessments and the inability of the farmers in said districts to pay, from the sale of the products of their farms, the costs of such operation and maintenance, such districts have been forced to issue and sell warrants of the districts, legally issued for such expense for the year 1932, which are outstanding and unpaid; and

Whereas it will be necessary, in order to pay such operating expenses, so that the farmers within such districts may be able to carry on their farms, for such irrigation districts to issue warrants for the payment of such expenses during the year 1933, which warrants can not be paid until the crops of 1933 are marketed; and

Whereas said warrants are a general lien upon the lands and water rights of such irrigation districts together with the interest thereon and are a first lien on said lands and said water rights subject only to the lien of the Department of Reclamation of the Government of the United States for construction purposes and will be paid as soon as the price of farm products is increased above the cost of production and the 1933 crops can be marketed; and

Whereas it is necessary that money be obtained for the operation and maintenance of said districts and to pay the cost for the distribution of water to said farms for the year 1933 if crops are to be produced on said lands; and

Whereas under the act of the Congress of the United States, approved July 21, 1932, known as the emergency relief and construction act of 1932, and the act of which it was an amendment, loans can not be made to such irrigation districts for the purposes herein provided; and

Whereas the interests of the thousands of farmers in said irrigation districts require that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make loans for such purpose and accept the warrants of such districts as securities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the House of Representatives concurring), That we most respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States of America to immediately broaden the terms of said act, by amendment thereto, under which loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may be made so as to include loans to such irrigation districts for such purpose, accepting as security therefor the warrants of said districts legally issued and registered in the manner provided by law, the payments of which, together with interest thereon, shall be guaranteed by assessments duly levied, or to be levied, as provided by law; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to forward certified copies of this memorial to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

This senate joint memorial passed the senate on the 6th day of February, 1933.

GEO. E. HILL,

This senate joint memorial passed the house of representatives on the 9th day of February, 1933.

ROBERT COULTER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I hereby certify that the within Senate Joint Memorial No. 4 originated in the senate during the twenty-second session of the Legislature of the State of Idaho.

M. J. HAMMOND,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate telegrams in the nature of petitions from Stuart L. Adams, Katherine and Edna McCollam, Pocahontas M. Smith, Mrs. Mary S. Stanton, Alice Labouisse, Anna Monroe Lyons, Eva L. Page, Rhetta Lyons, Anna E. Many, Eva J. Lyons, Florence Ambrose Smith, May Bernard Allen, Mrs. C. L. Eshleman, Mrs. Gustaf Westfeldt, Mrs. Joseph E. Friend, and Bertha Lataue, all dated the 16th instant, New Orleans, La., praying for a continuance of the investigation of the Louisiana senatorial election, 1932, by the special committee of the Senate to investigate campaign expenditures of the various presidential, vice presidential, and senatorial candidates in 1932, which were referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

One of the telegrams was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., February 16, 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT AND THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Can not too strongly urge in interest of good government that your senatorial investigating committee continue its work here until our political situation is purged of fraud. Kindly read this in Senate and publish in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

STUART L. ADAMS.

Mr. GEORGE presented the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas in 1918 the Federal Government embarked in the cotton-duck manufacturing business by building a mill for the employment of prisoners at the Atlanta Penitentiary; and

Whereas the inroads made by the product from this mill into the markets of the free mills manufacturing cotton duck have been and are to-day very serious, it appearing from the records as compiled by the Cotton Duck Association, the Association of Cotton Textile Merchants, the American Cotton Manufacturing Association, and the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers that this cotton mill has a total of 516 looms, of which 440 are wide-duck looms, making up the largest single producer of wide duck in the United States; and

Whereas the total production of over 5,000,000 pounds of wide duck per year constitutes over 25 per cent of the wide-duck production of all free mills combined—the output for the year 1931 amounted to 38 per cent; and

Whereas this concentration by the prison mill on wide duck to the extent of over 25 per cent of the total of free production constitutes a definite violation to the spirit and letter of the law under which the mill is operated (Public, No. 271, H. R. 7412, 71st Cong.), which specifically states in the first paragraph that Federal-prison employment shall reduce to the minimum competition with private industry and free labor; and

Whereas the present Superintendent of Prisons, Mr. Sanford Bates, in a public hearing before what is known as the Shannon committee on September 22, 1932, stated that if the prison mill were not now in existence he would not favor building such a mill, and added further that "the suggestion from your committee that we do not concentrate on one industry and that we be permitted to diversify would be a welcome suggestion to our bureau"; and

Whereas in view of the efforts being made for relief of the unemployed throughout the country, over 25 per cent of such unemployment in our cotton mills being directly attributed to the operation of this enterprise at the Federal prison; and

Whereas full authority in respect to this activity rest by act of Congress (Public, No. 271, 71st Cong., H. R. 7412) with the Attorney General of the United States: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, That the Attorney General be requested to review the facts submitted before the Shannon committee on September 22, 1932, and that action be taken to bring about such diversification of such activity at the Atlanta Penitentiary, in accordance with the laws, as will substantially and permanently decrease the manufacture of duck at this institution; be it further

Resolved, That the act of Congress approved July 10, 1918 (U. S. C., sec. 794, title 18), if necessary to prevent this unfair competition, both with one branch of the industry and as a whole, be amended so that the total manufacture of cotton duck shall be limited to an amount not in excess of 500,000 pounds per annum, except during such time as the United States Government may be at war: Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent our two Senators and the different Members of the House of Representatives from Georgia.

Mr. KEAN presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey favoring the making of sufficient appropriations to carry out the provisions of the national defense act of 1920 and its accompanying legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. BARBOUR on yesterday, p. 4214, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. BLAINE presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to impose higher tariff duties on dairy products, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See joint resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on yesterday, p. 4213, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. BLAINE also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin memorializing Congress to enact legislation for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President in nation-wide primary elections, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

(See joint resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on yesterday, p. 4313, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a letter from E. P. Moore, of Helena, Ark., suggesting the adoption of a "back-to-the-land" movement in the present economic situation, with sufficient support from the Government to finance first crops and homes and to supply cows, hogs, and work animals, instead of the continuance of present relief plans operating through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TYDINGS presented the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Bethesda, Md., praying for the balancing of the Budget by the adoption of a sales-tax plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Bethesda (Md.) Chamber of Commerce, protesting against reductions in the salaries of Federal employees, whether made directly or accomplished through the medium of a furlough plan, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11270) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1243) thereon.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 964) authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate all phases of taxation in relation to agriculture, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 255) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to sell surplus coal at nominal prices for distribution to the needy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1244) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 5651) to amend sections 361, 392, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, and 412 of the United States Code relating to the construction and inspection of boilers, unfired pressure vessels, and the appurtenances thereof; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CLARK:

A bill (S. 5652) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of Missouri; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BARBOUR:

A bill (S. 5653) granting a pension to Minnie Wild; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 5654) for the relief of W. L. Nygren; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 5655) giving the name "Lake Nevada" to the body of water resulting from the construction of the Hoover Dam; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

(Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas introduced Senate bill 5656, which appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 5657) for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana:

A bill (S. 5658) granting a pension to Flora B. Parker; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GEORGE:

A bill (S. 5659) authorizing the State of Georgia to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Savannah River at or near Lincolnton, Ga.; to the Committee on Commerce.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION LOANS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to introduce a bill and have it referred to the appropriate committee. I will make just a brief statement about it. The bill repeals that provision of law which requires or provides for publicity respecting loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The bill (S. 5656) to amend subsection (b) of section 201 of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

TAXATION OF CERTAIN NONINTOXICATING LIQUOR—AMENDMENT

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13742) to provide revenue by the taxation of certain nonintoxicating liquor, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RELIEF FOR THE UNEMPLOYED—AMENDMENT

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to Mr. WAGNER'S amendment to the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 6, line 5, after the word "markets," to insert "(including markets for the purpose of buying, selling, warehousing, or storing of agricultural commodities and livestock)."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 637. An act to relinquish the title of the United States to certain lands in the county of Los Angeles, State of California; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

H. R. 1169. An act for the relief of the Monumental Stevedore Co.;

H. R. 6933. An act for the relief of Zoe A. Tilghman;

H. R. 8879. An act for the relief of Joanna A. Sheehan; and

H. R. 11150. An act for the relief of G. C. Vandover; to the Committee on Claims.

H. R. 2601. An act for the relief of William Mathew Squires;

H. R. 2803. An act for the relief of John S. Stotts, deceased;

H. R. 3969. An act for the relief of John P. Leonard;

H. R. 4395. An act for the relief of Harry C. Anderson;

H. R. 7174. An act for the relief of James J. Meaney;

H. R. 7986. An act for the relief of William N. Fishburn;

H. R. 10070. An act for the relief of Beryl M. McHam; and

H. R. 11980. An act authorizing the President to make a posthumous award of a distinguished-flying cross to Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased, and to present the same to Lua Curtiss, mother of the said Glenn H. Curtiss, deceased; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CORRECTION IN ENROLLMENT OF HOUSE BILL 7522

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 49), which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 7522) to provide a new civil code for the Canal Zone and to repeal the existing civil code, to omit Senate amendments numbered 15 to 23, inclusive.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This concurrent resolution is merely for the purpose of correcting errors in the enrollment of a bill that passed the other day which was inadvertently misreported. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate concur in the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution of the House is concurred in.

SAMUEL C. DAVIS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1705) for the relief of Samuel C. Davis, which was, on page 1, line 10, after the figures "1930," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move that the House amendment be concurred in by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SAVANNAH RIVER NEAR LINCOLNTON, GA.

Mr. VANDENBERG. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 5659) authorizing the State of Georgia to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Savannah River at or near Lincolnton, Ga., and call it to the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the State of Georgia be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Savannah River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Lincolnton, Ga., and between Lincolnton, Ga., and McCormick, S. C., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the State of Georgia all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said State of Georgia is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of toll so fixed shall be the legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the cost of such bridge and its approaches, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible, under reasonable charges, but within a period of not to exceed 20 years from the completion thereof. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a short editorial appearing in to-day's Washington (D. C.) News, entitled "Repeal."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, Friday, February 17, 1933]

REPEAL

Thirteen years of good intentions gone wrong—and now relief is in sight. When the Senate yesterday voted for prohibition repeal, 63 to 23, it prepared the last rites for the no longer noble experiment. The American voters gave their mandate last November. The Senate has merely registered the popular will. That the House of Representatives will follow the Senate, and that the necessary State conventions will ratify repeal, seems certain—unless tricky politics delays.

We Americans learn slowly, but we learn.

We have learned that prohibition is the reverse of temperance. We have learned that morality can not be legislated, that speakeasies are worse than saloons, that a government which invades the liberties of citizens degrades itself in lawlessness.

Prohibition is not being abolished by drunkards but by patriots. No repeal is needed to get a drink, or too many drinks. Repeal is essential to restore respect for law, to take profit out of wholesale crime, to turn the Federal Government back to its rightful tasks and restore its legitimate revenues, to save ourselves from snoopery and hypocrisy, and to teach our children that there is no evil in beverage or food except intemperance.

Repeal will help. We need not be naïve enough to think it will solve the liquor problem. We were never a temperate people in anything.

But, with national prohibition out of the way, we can at least start to face the continuing problem of liquor control honestly and intelligently.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULE XVI

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I offer for printing in the RECORD a notice in writing of my intention to move to suspend paragraph 4 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate for the purpose of proposing an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the notice will be printed in the RECORD.

The notice is as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL, I hereby give notice in writing of my intention hereafter to move to suspend paragraph 4 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 14562) making appropriation for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, an amendment to the legislative pay act of 1929 concerning certain positions and rates of compensation under the jurisdiction of the Secretary and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and particularly at an appropriate place in the bill, the following amendment:

"The provisions of the legislative pay act of 1929 are hereby amended so as to correspond with the changes made by this act in the designations and rates of salary of certain positions in the Senate. This paragraph shall be effective from and after March 15, 1933.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT OFFICES

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a survey or appraisal of the so-called Doak reorganization of Federal employment offices made under the auspices of the University of Chicago and published in the Survey. This exceptionally thorough investigation justifies the criticism I made of that system and the prediction I made as to what would happen when the appropriation for the Employment Exchange Bureau in the Department of Labor was under consideration. This reorganization followed when the President vetoed the bill introduced by me and passed by Congress providing for a coordinated system of State and Federal employment offices. The report shows that the appointments were made purely upon a political basis and as political rewards, irrespective of the qualifications of this individual for the technical work involved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, was not the same report printed in the RECORD a few days ago?

Mr. WAGNER. No; I am sure it was not.

Mr. SMOOT. There was a report similar to this one printed in the RECORD. Is the Senator sure it was not this one?

Mr. WAGNER. I will assure the Senator that it was not this report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[From Survey Graphic, March, 1933]

INSTEAD OF A SYSTEM!

By Ruth M. Kellogg

More than 2,000,000 men and women were connected with jobs by the United States Employment Service and its cooperating offices last year, according to the annual report of the Secretary of Labor, given out in December. Mr. Doak viewed this as "no mean accomplishment in these times of reduced work opportunities." On the surface it would seem that such a showing is matter for congratulation; but we need to look below the surface.

The so-called Doak reorganization of the Federal employment system was announced after President Hoover's veto of the Wagner bill in March, 1931. That bill, which is again before Congress, outlined a scheme and provided an appropriation for a system of Federal-State or Federal-State-city employment offices. Such a forward step, taken in England in 1909 and in Germany since the war, has repeatedly been urged in this country as essential to any plan for dealing with unemployment in long-range terms. It becomes of even greater importance as we move toward compulsory unemployment insurance, since such measures depend in part on adequate public-placement services.

The Doak plan, we soon learned, was a strictly Federal plan with the entire staff freed of civil-service requirements and with no provision for integration with the established State services. A director was appointed for each State and for the District of Columbia. Statistics were soon available, purporting to show the placements made by the reorganized service and month by month the figures mounted to the impressive total announced for the past fiscal year.

But in spite of this encouraging news, skeptics continued to question the soundness of the United States Employment Service as reorganized by Secretary Doak. One heard that the new offices duplicated existing public agencies, that their location was determined by political consideration, that they were staffed by persons untrained in employment techniques, that supervision was inadequate, that methods of placement and record keeping were careless and ineffective. Their figures were called in question and they were charged with making political capital of the human misery of unemployment. Defenders of the reorganization insisted that an honest and effective job was being done.

The present article brings together facts on the actual working of the scheme gathered in a 12-week field study that took the writer into 16 States between August and November, 1932. An associate gathered first-hand material in the Northwest in September. In addition, a wealth of information from reliable sources in the other States is still accumulating. While in the field we visited the employment offices, talked with staff members, with the State directors and with representatives of State labor departments, organized labor, employers' associations, city governments, social agencies, the press, and other informed persons. The study, directed by H. A. Millis, Paul Douglas, and B. M. Squires, of the economics faculty of the University of Chicago, was made possible by a grant from the social science research committee of the university. A detailed report of our findings will be published later. The present article attempts to cover only the high spots of our experience and a summary of our conclusions.

The survey was an unbiased effort to determine the strengths and the weaknesses of this attempt to organize the labor market and to give to the employer, the employee, and the community an effective clearing house for workers and for jobs. If our report carries little commendation and less to sustain Mr. Doak's claim of 2,000,000 workers placed, it is because no unbiased observer could fail to be dismayed by the lack of performance, the waste of public money, the inefficiency, even the bad faith, to be found in most of these offices at a time when there is special need for the kind of service the public was led to believe would be supplied.

We must look at the Doak reorganization against the background of the country's brief experience with a Federal employment service. A small beginning was made in the panic year 1907 within the Bureau of Immigration. The job of the bureau vanished with the beginning of the war, and it was decided to convert the immigration offices into employment agencies. A swift expansion of the employment service followed during this period, but when the war ended the hopeful beginnings vanished. Only a skeleton of the Federal service was left, although numerous offices were continued by the States, a few of the salaries for which were paid from Washington. Between 1920 and 1930 the Federal appropriation for employment services was $200,000 a year, compared to $5,500,000 for the fiscal year 1918–19. The only employment offices actually operated by the service were the farm-labor offices, originated during the war to recruit and distribute harvest hands. The number of these offices has varied; there were 18 in 1930, 20 early in 1932, but the number recently dropped to 13. In 1930, 23 veterans' employment offices were opened by the United States Employment Service in various parts of the country. Their number was increased to 30 by the end of June, 1932.

In addition to the independent Federal agencies, the United States Employment Service includes the cooperative offices. In these a member of the staff of a local public-employment office is put on the Government's pay roll as a dollar-a-year man (or woman). The United States Employment Service then extends the franking privilege to this office and supplies it with record forms if they are desired. In return, the local office turns over to the Federal service its figures on registration, employers' orders, placements, and so on. This is not a new arrangement, but in the past has been confined quite largely to State or municipal employment offices. Under the Doak reorganization, some of the State directors have made no further use of this cooperative arrangement, while others have extended it widely. In Colorado, for instance, the service includes 14 such offices. Among the organizations now maintaining cooperative services are the Young Women's Christian Association, the local chamber of commerce, the American Legion, the Urban League, and, more recently, relief agencies.

To get a picture of the service under the reorganization, let me begin by describing the offices themselves as I saw them and the personnel with which they are staffed and then consider the actual functioning of the scheme.

To find these officers sometimes called for a Sherlock Holmes procedure. Usually the local telephone directory indicates their location, but occasionally even this fails. Most of the offices occupy rent-free quarters in public buildings, usually the local post office. But after reaching the post office I have gone from a basement entrance to the topmost floor, which sometimes means "elevator to fourth, walk up one," with no sign to guide me to the office I sought. This rent-free location may or may not be convenient to industry or suitable for the work presumed to be done. In Atlanta, Ga., for example, the State director and the Veterans' Bureau staff share a large room on the fifth floor of the post office. The industrial location is satisfactory, but there is no provision for privacy in interviewing, and men and women of all races, trades, and skills are handled in the same room. In Topeka, Kans., the staff of three was found huddled in a room with the income-tax collectors, the limited space crowded with desks. In some places—Omaha, Birmingham, Nashville, for example—an office with an outer and an inner room affords privacy for interviewing when so used.

Personnel is, of course, even more important than physical externals of location and space. In April, 1931, Secretary Doak stated that an effort had been made, and he felt it had been successful, "to obtain experienced, agreeable persons for the new employment service."

John R. Alpine, chosen to head up the service, was formerly international president of the Plumbers and Steamfitters' Union and a vice president of the American Federation of Labor. At the time of his appointment he had been for 10 years connected with an automatic sprinkler company.

When the hearings on the Wagner bill were being held by the Senate Committee on Commerce last March Mr. Alpine was questioned as to the qualifications of the staff selected for the reorganized service. Although the director considered this "a strange question to ask," he finally said:

"The experience of all men whom we have placed is that they have gone through a workaday life all the time and have had all the experiences that come through the schools of adversity * * * they have gone out with practical knowledge of rubbing shoulders with the world; they have gone out because of their own knowledge of what it means to be out of work, and not by any theorizing or by means of any knowledge gathered through books or other kind of data. Their knowledge has been practical. They know how to go and get jobs for a man.

He further contended that since his staff was made up of men who had been out of work at times themselves they knew "how they tried to find work for themselves, and they feel qualified to find it for somebody else if it can be found." Clearly Mr. Alpine fails to realize that employment office work calls for specialized training. The fact that Mr. Doak is himself a railroad man undoubtedly accounts for a considerable number of railroad men in staff positions.

At the same time certain logical and happy appointments as State directors were made, notably C. W. Woodman, of Fort Worth, and W. C. Carpenter, of Spokane, among those we saw, both of them with conspicuously successful experience as assistant directors in the farm labor service, positions they still fill in addition to serving as Federal directors for Texas and Washington.

As a rule, two or three persons are attached to each office. The total budget for the last fiscal year, Mr. Doak states, was $938,780. Until more information is available we can not know just how this money was allocated. The salary scale for the service seems to run about as follows: State director, $3,000 to $4,000; manager of a local office, $2,000; assistant (if there is one), $1,800; stenographer, $1,440; subject, of course, to the cuts recently applied to all Federal salaries. The travel allowance for the director, in the few instances where a figure was available, has been between $45 and $65 a month. Certainly more funds are required for an adequate employment service, yet even a casual observer must conclude that more could be done with the available money if care and imagination went into the budgeting and spending of it.

In choosing a staff, as well as in its use later, political considerations play a conspicuous part. At the Senate hearings, Mr. Alpine declared, "This employment service * * * has been as free from politics and political influence as it was possible to keep it." Mr. Doak expressed the fear that the Wagner bill would mean State agencies "given over largely to politics." Yet in a certain southern State I was told of a man converted to the Republican Party overnight in order to qualify him as State director in the Federal employment service. One woman lost her job and another was appointed in her stead because the former was known not to "vote right." Staff members in some offices were instructed for whom to work in the preelection campaign and for whom to vote. Undoubtedly numerous ones took an active part in the presidential campaign, even though it meant being away from their desks for days at a time. I saw Republican campaign buttons and literature in several offices and was even volunteered solemn assurance of the virtues of this party and its candidates. Little wonder that some directors, who entered the service with the hope of doing worth-while employment work have become disillusioned and unhappy. One feels pity rather than condemnation for some of the staff. Yet sympathy and pity are scarcely due the many who take complete advantage of the situation.

Some strange anomalies have appeared in this matter of staff. It has already been pointed out that the State director in Fort Worth, Tex., carries a double responsibility. His office also does a general placement work for men in a city of 163,447. The Federal Government pays the salary of only one other person in this office. (The city provides a third.) However, when an office was established in Abilene, Tex., under the Doak plan, a staff of three was appointed, although this city has less than 25,000 population.

Dallas, a city of 260,475, established an employment office prior to the Doak reorganization. Some time later the State director had one of the women staff members placed on the Federal pay roll. Presently the city decided to discontinue its employment office and transfer this woman to the employment division of the welfare department. The one Federal salary was cut off during the summer. In reply to protests against the loss of this much-needed staff member, Mr. Alpine wrote:

"The Congress did not see fit to provide the employment service with sufficient funds with which to carry on all of our activities for the present fiscal year 1933, which has of necessity meant the closing of many of our employment offices and the dismissal of a considerable number of employees. It is very much regretted that we are unable to continue the aid heretofore extended to Dallas, for we all know that it will mean a real hardship to the unemployed in your city."

There was a very different situation in a certain community in Kentucky, a State not "conceded" by the Republicans. This Kentucky town is near the State line, and most of its wage earners are ordinarily employed across the river in a larger Ohio city. A Federal office was opened in the Kentucky city in January, 1932, with a staff of two. Two more were added in the spring, and all four were still on the pay roll when I was there late in October. The office "economized" by having no telephone and no business sign. The manager refused free publicity, resented having unemployed workers sent to him by local relief agencies, and was often away from his office and frankly padded his reports. It is to the credit of two of the staff that they wanted to do some real work and were unhappy in the existing situation. There were "sufficient funds" to continue this overstaffed, useless office but none to keep on an effective worker in Dallas.

Numerous outside workers or "contact men" were appointed during 1932. Several State directors found themselves supplied with assistants they had not requested and regarding whose appointments they had not been consulted. Thus in one Southern State a certain business man found his own job had suddenly disappeared in the depression. He was in Washington at the time and got in touch with an eastern Congressman who was indebted to him for a past favor. The position of assistant director in his home State was created for the southerner and he returned to notify the director of his appointment. He held the job for six months, although, as he told me, "I thought it [the employment service] was a joke the whole time I was in and laughed up my sleeve about it, yet it was my bread and butter at the time." In another State the director learned through a newspaper of the appointment of his assistant. The general consensus of opinion seemed to be that the latter's chief occupation was "politics and stirring up trouble."

So far as could be observed, the work in the local communities is not strengthened by the kind of supervision given it by Washington or, except in a few instances, by the State director. In April, 1931, the 40 State directors who had been appointed at that time were called to the Capitol for a general conference as they began their new work. The State directors of Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, and North Carolina met once in Atlanta on their own initiative and at their own expense. In some States the employment service is limited to the work done in the office of the State director. If there are other offices in the State, most of the directors make the rounds occasionally, although their travel allowances are meager. The Industrial Employment Information Bulletin, issued from Washington and based on material secured from the State directors, comes out so late that it is of little practical value.

Some of the suggestions from Washington have revealed a woeful lack of understanding of employment principles and technique. Thus a letter sent to State directors and some others on the Federal pay roll urged that the local employment offices cooperate with "individual personal finance companies" on the basis of the latter's "intimate knowledge of large numbers of wage-earners' families in their respective localities, collected in the course of their financial service to customers." Mr. Alpine, who signed the letter, added "* * * it is mutually understood that the cooperation offered by the personal finance companies is directed solely to assistance in securing jobs for unemployed workers." The proposal amazed numerous directors. Mr. Alpine sent out a second letter telling them to use their own judgment in the matter.

One of the chief criticisms of the Doak scheme has been that no apparent attention has been paid to the existence of State or city employment offices or even of other Federal bureaus in the community in which the new offices were located. Last August there were Federal offices, exclusive of farm and veterans' offices, in 96 cities. Twenty-one of the 30 veterans' offices were distributed among the same cities but little or no effort was made to integrate the two services. In some communities the two offices shared quarters, in some they had adjacent rooms, in still others they were at different addresses. In any case, they were run as separate enterprises, a situation bordering on the ridiculous in some instances. Forty-nine of the 96 cities were those in which the State director has his (or her) headquarters. Almost always this office carries on a placement service. In 18 States this was the only general Federal office in the State. Fifty-five of the 96 cities were in States conducting employment services of their own. Previously established State offices were located in 40 of these 55 communities.

If there is any logical basis for this duplication of offices I failed to find it. Iowa, for example, has two State employment offices, each with a staff of two members. In both instances one staff member has for years been paid by the Federal Government. Washington opened two completely separate Federal offices in the same cities. The one in Des Moines is called a veterans' office but it also registers nonservice men and women. The Federal and State offices in Sioux City face one another across the street. In Illinois three offices were opened outside of Chicago, two of them in cities having State offices. The State director insisted that the offices must be combined in some fashion, but his efforts met with only partial success, for the local Congressmen willed otherwise. The offices established in Kansas are in cities having a State service, as is the case in California. The only Federal service in Wisconsin is in Milwaukee, the location of one of the most effective State-city employment centers in the country. Oklahoma City's Federal office was first opened three doors from the State employment office but has since moved to rent-free quarters elsewhere. On orders from Washington, the Ohio State director does placement work in his own office in Columbus. A new office was opened in Toledo. The two men appointed to open a veterans' office in Cincinnati finally took desks in the city-State office, after strenuous objection on the part of local officials to a duplicating office. The veterans' office in Cleveland began its work in 1930. In each of these four Ohio cities there is a State-city employment center, that in Cleveland being one of the outstanding offices in the United States. Requests for Federal offices in Ohio industrial cities not served by city-State agencies have been ignored in Washington. The one Federal office in Georgia is in Atlanta, the only city in the State having a city employment service, a commendable service in itself.

So it has been in State after State. The situation becomes even more ridiculous in the three States in which demonstration employment centers have been established (see Survey Graphic, February, 1933, p. 87); even in Rochester, Philadelphia, Minneapolis, and Duluth Mr. Alpine has seen fit to open offices. Granted that in city after city the State service is inadequate, the opening of duplicate, competitive offices does not improve the situation.

The determining factor in locating a new office in all too many cases seems to be not need or convenience, but politics. The State director's office is usually established in a principal city in the State, though this does not always hold. The first director in Kentucky lived in a small town in the extreme western part of the State. So long as he held the position the office of State director was maintained in this town. When it comes to the question of additional Federal offices within a State I found case after case in which the State director had had no voice in the matter. Instead the decision was made in Washington. The director was then notified and supplied with the names of his new staff members. Here, again, in at least one instance the director obtained his information through a daily paper. Omitting cities large enough to include a congressional district, and hence of necessity the home of a Congressman, we find that a Senator or Representative very frequently lives in the community in which one of the new offices is opened. Toledo, Ohio, where an apparently unnecessary Federal office was located, is the home of Postmaster General Brown. The political significance of the Doak reorganization is admitted even by some of those working under it and taken for granted by many others well qualified to know. As one staff member commented, "They [Washington] say they don't play politics and then they go right ahead and do it." Even Secretary Doak, when referring to a southern director, congratulated himself that there was at least one Republican in that State.

Relations between the "Doak" employment offices and other local services vary from State to State with the experience and attitude of the State director and the staff in local offices. In Jackson, Miss., although the office was until recently classed as a farm-labor agency, the man formerly in charge made his work a real part of the community employment service. The men and women carrying on various types of free employment service in St. Louis have formed themselves into a committee of employment executives, but the staff of the Federal offices was unaware of this group and its activities. The many contacts with employers of which the Federal men told me seemed, for the most part, highly superficial. I gained the impression that they were more concerned with securing information for the Industrial Employment Information Bulletin than with getting genuinely acquainted with the employers' labor needs.

Labor leaders varied in their attitude toward United States employment service. Little respect was felt for it and many were quick to express their condemnation of the "Doak" system as a good deal of a farce. Enthusiasm was as weak as the remark, "Well, if somebody has to be in that office, I'm glad — got it." Friction and bad feeling were encountered repeatedly between the State labor department and the Federal group. In certain instances the head of the former expressed pity for the State director, well realizing that he was not free to organize his own job.

It is hard to evaluate the figures included in the Secretary of Labor's report, especially since only totals are given. Mr. Alpine has stated over the radio that more than three and a third million placements were made between April 1, 1931, and November 1, 1932, and he gives credit to the United States Employment Service for well over half of these. Again, one can not argue with his statement until more facts are known but surely he must have included in his total all of the "directed to employment" figures of the farm-labor division and also the placements of the veterans' offices. In no other way can I square his statement with the facts as I found them. Although confronted repeatedly with the statement, "We aren't allowed to give out any information," I learned of instance after instance in which the placements averaged between 45 and 150 a month. Sometimes they sank to 15 or even 5. One office had made only 166 placements in the preceding 11 months. In another, the director frankly said that his office had made practically none but he didn't believe in sending in fictitious or padded reports.

Less-conscientious staff members have found ingenious ways of increasing their placement totals. In one city it is the custom for the Federal man to call on any firm known to have added a number of workers to its pay roll, obtain the names of these new employees and include them in his placements. Another man asked permission to go over the pay rolls of a number of local firms. When he came upon the name of an employee registered at his office he counted that person as a placement, explaining "He ought to come and tell us anyway." One State director asked that he be supplied with the names and addresses of all men given jobs on Federal highway relief work. These were to be counted as placements because "It's all done with Federal money so why shouldn't the Federal Employment Service get the credit?" In another State there are several instances in which the Federal office included among its placements the total pay roll working on a certain project though it had probably had no contact with these men. The director with some one nominally on his staff on a dollar-a-year basis in a relief organization handling made-work has an excellent chance to swell his totals. During the American Legion drive for jobs in the spring of 1932 it was customary to appoint a veteran on this cooperative basis. The drive totals, themselves highly inflated in some instances, added substantially to the Federal figures.

The records of the Federal employment offices are a poor index of community-employment conditions. Only a small percentage of the jobless workers of any city ordinarily register at the United States employment office. Theoretically the offices separate their registrations into "active" and "inactive" applications, but as a rule the files are not brought up to date oftener than twice a year. Some Federal men frankly stated that their files had never been cleared of "dead timber." No reasonable person expects an employment office to show a large percentage of its applicants placed, nor an impressive total of permanent connections in a period of depression. But in view of the practices followed in the Federal offices, their figures on registration and placements, particularly attempts to compare one office with another or give cost per placement, become utterly meaningless.

As I made the rounds of the "reorganized" offices I found numerous people, myself included, questioning the future of the Doak plan. Some freely labeled it a farce and a subterfuge intended to sidetrack the enactment of the Wagner bill. Even some of the staff expected their services to be discontinued "after election." On July 1, 1932, lack of finances closed numerous offices which had been opened only the preceding February, yet limited finances do not wholly explain the offices discontinued and the staffs cut down toward the end of 1932. Evidence piles up showing that the Federal Government is cutting off the Federal salaries of persons who have for years been a part of the staff in State employment offices, this in spite of vigorous protest and while there are still many Federal offices duplicating other services. Thus in New York State Federal offices have been continued in Rochester and Elmira, where there are State employment centers, but closed in Schenectady and Auburn, where there are none.

Clearly, with adequate supervision and increased funds the service could be made more effective than it has been so far. In States conducting no employment service of their own a strictly Federal service might fill a useful place, though even in these States there would remain the problem of relating such a service to established municipal employment offices. Certain defects stand out in the Doak scheme: There is no provision for real integration with State employment offices; a staff freed of civil-service requirements very easily becomes a part of the spoils system; no provision is made for advisory committees, either national or local. Repeatedly I saw in States that would welcome a genuinely cooperative plan, including a pooling of funds and experience, a strong resentment against the present set-up.

Even if the staff should later be placed under civil service, with able advisory committees formed and utilized, our survey convinces us that the Doak plan is unlikely to lead to an adequate public employment service in this country. Granting that better leadership would eliminate duplicating offices, the scheme would still leave a dual system in State after State. To avoid this it would be necessary to limit the Federal set-up to States having no employment services of their own. The result would be further diffusion of effort, instead of a coordinated, nation-wide service.

The Doak plan, now in its second year, has served not only to make clear the points at which its administration falls short but the weakness of the plan itself. Its basic defects are met by the system that would replace it if the Wagner bill were enacted into law. That bill provides for Federal civil-service employees and for properly constituted advisory committees. And it rests not on a rigid Federal set-up but on national support for a flexible organization established and administered by the States and by local communities to meet our need for an adequate and honest public employment service.

SALE OF LAND IN HARFORD COUNTY, MD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 567) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland, which were, on page 2, line 15, after "Company," to insert "and that the said railroad company shall replace any and all fences, and any other improvements on said property without expense to the Government," and on page 2, line 18, after "thereof," to insert "and not less, in any event, than the sum of $3,759."

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I move concurrence in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE 5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to discuss at this time a bill which I have introduced to prohibit the use of interstate commerce for the transportation of goods manufactured or mined in establishments where employees work longer than five days per week and six hours per day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the Senator going to discuss the legal phase of the measure?

Mr. BLACK. Not this morning.

It is my sincere belief that the prompt enactment of this measure into law would bring about the quick employment of millions of jobless Americans and at the same time actually benefit legitimate industry and languishing agriculture. The bill is not offered as a cure for all our economic ills but as a major part of an imperatively necessary program for national readjustment and recovery.

There are, of course, other pressing problems of vital importance. Without attempting to enumerate all of them, but on account of their fundamental nature, might be mentioned farm-mortgage indebtedness and, indeed, all kinds and forms of our crushing load of debts, low farm commodity prices, the unstable and shifting value of our dollar, and our lost foreign trade.

To-day, however, I wish to present this one measure, relating directly to the one subject of hours of labor in industry, and attempt to show that it has an indirect bearing upon all other phases of trade and commerce, and indeed is a subject that can not and must not be ignored in any comprehensive plan to restore normal business activities and bring about that economic justice upon which the domestic tranquility of our people depends.

Since January 5, a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee has held hearings on this bill. Those hearings have been completed, and I am so thoroughly convinced of the justice of the bill, as well as the urgent necessity for its passage, that I shall seek to secure action from this body as soon as possible.

In the meantime, I think it fitting and appropriate, that I state to the Senate the reasons upon which it rests, and review to a limited extent the evidence before the committee.

Numerous witnesses have appeared before the subcommittee. These have been voluntary witnesses, and the overwhelming majority have favored it.

Appearing for it have been manufacturers, representatives of organized labor, engineers, economists, social workers, lawyers, merchants, farm representatives, and others. It has been most significant that some of the manufacturers have represented business enterprises which are the largest of their kind in the world. Representatives of factories and enterprises have favored it from almost every kind and class of business. These representatives have represented industries employing hundreds of thousands of men and women. Lawyers, who have appeared to argue against the measure on legal grounds, have expressed themselves in unqualified terms as favoring the objective of a shorter work week and shorter work day. Others have appeared to oppose national legislation, but strongly favor State legislation for the same purpose.

There have been some significant facts in connection with the few who expressed themselves against it.

One witness testified against it who is a communist, and who said that "the capitalist system will only be overturned by force," and that he favored overturning it. His testimony clearly disclosed his desire to destroy our present form of government, and his fear that measures like this providing work for the people would delay what he called "the crisis" and would prolong a government he wanted to see destroyed by force.

The attorney for the National Manufacturers' Association also testified against the measure. Both the attorney for this manufacturers' association and the communist who testified against the bill professed sympathy with the objective of shortening hours of labor.

Apparently, however, the communist opposed the measure chiefly because he believed our system to be so inherently bad that he did not want a measure of this kind to allay existing and growing discontent. The attorney for the manufacturers, on the other hand, is not willing to have a desirable objective obtained by law.

It is my belief that this measure should be speedily enacted into law. Among other important effects, the evidence before our committee indicates it would have the following results:

First. The adoption of the 5-day week and 6-hour day would bring about the employment of approximately six and one-half million of our present army of jobless and despairing citizens within a comparatively short period of time.

Second. It would aid the farmers and business enterprises of the Nation by greatly increasing the aggregate purchasing power of the people.

Third. The absorption of the vast number of unemployed in useful labor would aid in the reestablishment of confidence and would be a long step toward a restoration of normal business conditions and would aid in relieving the widespread misery and distress abroad throughout the land.

It is my belief that American industry working its employees five days a week and six hours per day, can produce all that is needed in times of prosperity to satisfy the demands of both our foreign and domestic commerce. The marvelous advances in machinery and efficient mass production support this statement. It is difficult to understand how any thinking person can deny this development who has given proper weight to the evidence around him and the facts available to all who seek reliable information. The fallacy of the economic dogma that the niggardliness of nature and the insatiability of human wants justify long hours in order to produce a limitless supply of ever-increasing commodities, has been exposed and disproven by the inventive genius of man. Dogmatic assertions of economic laws that can not survive the test of workability are not sound.

New principles recognize the lavish generosity of nature. The problem in our complex age is one of satisfying human wants through a proper system of distribution. That is our task to-day.

In connection with this bill I would invite the attention of Senators, particularly those on the other side of the aisle, to the words of Abraham Lincoln. He said long ago:

> So long as there is a man willing to work, but unable to find employment, the hours of labor are too long.

It is also proper at this time to call attention to one sentence in the acceptance speech of President-elect Roosevelt. In discussing unemployment and public works, he said:

> So as to spread the points of all kinds as widely as possible, we must take definite steps to shorten the working day and the working week.

Many statements from men in business and public life might be quoted to strengthen these principles. Let us, however, review some of the evidence before our committee.

INCREASED PRODUCTIVITY

Let us take up first the question of increased productivity. I shall give only a few illustrations.

An example of increased productivity is found in the rubber business. The Department of Labor bulletin of December, 1932, shows this in the following language:

> Mr. BLACK. Man-hour output in the manufacture of pneumatic tires—that is one of the industries in which some of them have gone on a 5-day week—it has increased 86 per cent since 1928, 172 per cent since 1922, 581 per cent since 1914 as the result of technological circumstances, according to a study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The displacement of men in railroad business is shown by the following evidence of Mr. Lovell:

> The records of the Interstate Commerce Commission disclose that from the year 1919 to 1929, a 10-year period, during which the railroads of this country did the greatest volume of business, perhaps made the greatest earnings of any similar period in their history, 350,000 railroad employees were eliminated from the service, not in a business depression but when this country was booming in business. That reduction came about by bigger engines, more efficient engines, bigger cars, heavier bridges, heavier track, more efficient operation.

Mr. Austin T. Levy, of Harrisville, R. I., testified at length before the committee. He operates a number of woolen mills in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Virginia, representing a capital investment of $3,500,000. He gave some interesting evidence on technological advance and displacement of labor. He said in part as follows:

> I must plead guilty myself to being as great an offender in that respect as there is in the wool textile industry. Our factory has undergone as great changes technologically as any in our industry, which means merely another way of saying that we have displaced workers. * * * They have not been absorbed, and they can not be absorbed.
> The same is going on in all lines of business.

Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, who has made a careful and close study of the technological changes, testified as follows:

Industry has become so highly mechanized that it is utterly and absolutely impossible to provide work opportunities or to provide work at the old standards of hours, work week, and work day. So that we are face to face with the inevitable fact that adjustments must be made in the working period and working time, or we must settle down and prepare to accept an economic condition which will create and establish and maintain a permanent standing army of unemployed.

An interesting illustration of labor displacement in drilling oil wells was given by Mr. T. S. Hogan, of Midland, Tex. He said:

In the past 30 years I have been in the oil business. I have drilled oil wells from the Canadian border to Mexico in many of our States of the United States—New Mexico, Texas, Arizona, Idaho, and many others. When I started in the business we considered a good job if we drilled a well 3,000 feet deep in one year. In the east Texas field in Texas, the largest oil field ever discovered, comprising 110,000 acres of producing oil land, there are contractors there who have drilled—one company I know of—eight wells in succession, 3,650 feet deep, each on an average drilling time of 56 hours.

Increased productivity in coal mines was shown by Mr. Philip Murray, vice president of the United Mine Workers of America. He said:

The increased use of machinery is shown by the average tons mined per man per day. This was as follows: In 1890 the average tons produced per man per day were 2.56 tons. In 1900 it was 2.98 tons. In 1910 it was 3.46 tons. In 1920 it was 4 tons. In 1929 the average tons per man per day was 4.85. In 1930 it was 5.06, and in 1931 it was 5.30 tons * * *. The difference between 1890 and 1931 would be, roughly, 100 per cent.

The United Mine Workers feel that with the increased use of machinery, as shown by the above figures of productive efficiency, a reduction in the hours per day is a necessity. The existing misery and distress and unemployment make the present the logical time for granting this needful relief.

Mr. Thomas F. McMahon gave another illustration of technological labor displacement in the woolen industry:

I have here taken the woolen industry first, and I wanted you gentlemen to know that it came from one who has spent a lifetime as a foreman in a woolen mill, and he finds that in 1900 a weaver who operated one loom, which was a customary thing at that particular time, 32 years ago, with the speed of the loom 80 picks motion, 90 threads a minute through the shuttle, 60-hour week, could weave a maximum yardage per week of 250 yards. In 1932 the weaver is operating 120 picks, or 30 picks more per minute, a 54-hour week, producing 2,400 yards.

The Washington Daily News of February 13, 1932, contained the following news item:

The Knitwear Industrial Exposition opened in New York to-day. On exhibition is a knitting machine that does the work of 300 persons knitting by hand. One operator can run four such machines, thus the machine enables one man to do the work of 1,200. The machine produces 50 square yards of knitted fabric an hour.

Mr. Levy, a worsted manufacturer, gave the committee an interesting side light on the subject of wages as related to technological advances. He said:

In 1912 a weaver working 60 hours a week earned $15, if he was a good weaver, or 25 cents an hour. In 1933—and I hope the Black bill will be operative during the year 1933—a weaver working under its provisions only 30 hours a week and earning as much, we will say, as $30, or $1 an hour, will produce a yard of similar cloth at 57 per cent less than the cost of producing it in 1912 at 25 cents an hour. In other words, the technological advance has accomplished something which should redound not only to the benefit of the consumer but also to the benefit of the man who produces the thing that is sold.

The CHAIRMAN. This comes about, I presume, because of the new improvements in machinery.

Mr. LEVY. Because the man runs more machines and the machines run at a higher speed, are operated with a greater percentage of efficiency—a combination of those three factors.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have been out of the Chamber during a portion of the interesting and instructive address of the able Senator from Alabama. Perhaps he has discussed the question I desire to propound. It is, What will be the effect on the wages of individual workers if the Senator's bill should be passed?

Mr. BLACK. I have not discussed that question, but I am going to give a review of the testimony on that subject before the committee from the various witnesses. It is a very pertinent question; and I am very frank to state to the Senator that if this bill did not increase the aggregate purchasing power of the people who work it would fail of its purpose.

Let me next take up, very briefly, the question of hours of work to-day. We have heard a great deal about the share-the-work movement, and the impression has been left that people are not working long hours to-day. The exact contrary is true. That has been disclosed by the evidence of manufacturers and laboring people. As a matter of fact, the hours have greatly increased since the depression began.

Even since the depression began hours of labor in industry have increased while wages have decreased. This is true in spite of the effort to put the share-the-work plan into effect.

In the cotton textiles, in 1932, the 55-hour week still predominated. Some mills worked 60 hours, and some as high as 76 hours per week. Many mills worked 11, 12, and 13 hours per night.

Woolen mills worked 50 hours to 67½ hours per week, and some worked 13 hours per night.

Sawmills had an average standard of 56 hours.

Silk and rayon mills still work 10 hours per day, and practically all work a 10-hour night. Many work 12 and 13 hour shifts at night.

Mr. Max Baker, a silk manufacturer and secretary of the Silk Manufacturers' Association of Paterson, N. J., who is on the manufacturing side of the question, in testifying for the 30-hour bill, gave the following surprising evidence:

I speak to you also for the manufacturers of Paterson, who are working anywhere from 18 hours a day themselves. We have mills in Paterson where employees are working 17 hours a day on one shift, and it is not uncommon for people to work 12 and 14 hours. The average hours to-day in Paterson are about 55 hours per week. Wages have come down terribly. The leaders of our industry admit it.

With reference to working hours since the depression began, Mr. Baker testified that the hours of labor per day had increased since the depression 20 to 25 per cent, and that wages have decreased.

Speaking for the bill, Mr. Baker said:

From conversation with men in our industry, large and small, it is an impossibility for our industry to put its house in order by itself.

He said the manufacturers were helpless to reach an agreement and reduce hours in that way.

Mr. Joseph Haines, jr., of Philadelphia, president of the Full-Fashioned Hosiery Co., testified that since the depression wages have gone down 50 per cent, and working hours per day have increased. He favors a law providing for a shorter working week.

Mr. Emil Rieve, president of the American Full-Fashioned Hosiery Works, of Philadelphia, testified on this subject as follows:

Senator BLACK. The average is what now?
Mr. RIEVE. About $16.50 per week.
Senator BLACK. What was it in 1928?
Mr. RIEVE. In 1928 it was around $32.
Senator BLACK. And it is $16.50 now?
Mr. RIEVE. Approximately half.
Senator BLACK. And are the people working longer hours per day?
Mr. RIEVE. On the average I will say they are working longer hours per day.

Mr. Isadore Teitelbaum, appearing as the representative of the National Furniture Manufacturers' Association, in favor of the shorter work week and day, testified as follows:

Senator BLACK. Have they increased the hours of labor during the depression?
Mr. TEITELBAUM. No question about it.
Senator BLACK. What would you say the average has been, the average increase in hours per day, since the depression began?
Mr. TEITELBAUM. A minimum of two hours.
The CHAIRMAN. The pay has not been increased in proportion?
Mr. TEITELBAUM. The pay has decreased. There is no question about that.

Now let us consider for a moment what would be the effect of the 30-hour week and 6-hour day on unemployment, because that is one of the most material points to-day.

Let us take first the testimony of Mr. William Green, who has investigated the subject with great care.

Mr. William Green testified as to the effect of the application of the 6-hour day and 30-hour week as follows:

If work hours could be universally shortened to 30 per week in industry and government, excluding agriculture, 6,500,000 jobs could be created for those now out of work. More than 11,000,000 are now unemployed. With the constant increase in technological improvements and labor-saving machinery, it seems unlikely that more than a few million of these unemployed can be taken back to work in the next few years, even when business improves. For improvement must come slowly and technological development will continue. Therefore, the reemployment of at least 6,500,000 by shortening work hours to 30 per week is an essential basic adjustment for our future progress. That is an inescapable fact. We can not sidetrack it and remove it. We can not go around it. It is standing there. * * *

Senator WALSH of Montana. If business activities are resumed and reached a normal basis, by reason of the improvement in methods and the introduction of new and improved machinery, together with the further utilization of power, we would still have some 4,000,000 unemployed.

Mr. GREEN. Yes; I think the figures would be in excess of that, Senator.

Senator WALSH of Montana. That is to say, the work could be done with 4,000,000 men left.

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. Herman Chopak, of the Chopak Textile Co., of New York, testifying in favor of the bill, gave the following facts from his practical knowledge as to the effect on employment of the 5-day week and 6-hour day. He said:

The principal reason why the bill should be adopted is that it will create more employment. To accomplish the same amount of work it will naturally require the employment of a greater number of people at 30 hours per week than it does at the present time, when the working week ranges from approximately 40 to 44 hours per week. It is a known fact that years ago it was not unusual for the average worker to work 60 to 72 hours a week. This was changed due to the fact that machinery at that time started to make inroads into man power to such an extent that it was necessary to curtail the working week to its present basis of approximately 40 to 54 hours. Privilege of working longer hours with other help should be considered satisfactory.

We have again reached the turning point where we must once more curtail the working week, this time to a 30-hour basis.

As an example I can give you my own business, with which I am, of course, best acquainted. We employ approximately a hundred people in the distributing end of our business. They work about 44 hours weekly. If the law became effective limiting the working week to 30 hours, in order to accomplish the same amount of work necessary we would require approximately 20 to 25 additional people in our distributing department.

In the manufacturing end of our business we employ directly and indirectly approximately 3,000 people. At the present time they are working from 48 to 50 hours weekly. In order to turn out the same amount of yardage it will be necessary on a 30-hour basis for us to employ at least 750 more people.

These figures, which I offer as an example, can readily give you an idea of the thousands of factories in this and other industries that would have to do likewise, with the consequent employment of millions of now unemployed.

I shall not go at further length into the question of the effect in so far as reemployment is concerned.

Now, reaching the subject suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] as to the effect of this bill on wages, I will state that I have not attempted to gather all of the statements that have been made before the committee on this subject, but enough to give a general idea as to the thought of those who have testified in favor of the bill, all of whom favor holding the wage standard high. On this question let me first quote from Mr. William Green.

Mr. Green was asked the following questions, and the following answers were given:

If this shorter work week and shorter work day was brought about by law, which it is apparent now is about the only way it can be brought about universally, would it not be more difficult for the employers to reduce the wages in proportion than it is when they share the work according to the plans that have been adopted by the country?

Mr. GREEN. Yes. We would be able to maintain the wage standards better through the universal application of the shorter work day and the shorter work week. Then we can be putting it into effect, not in an isolated but in a progressive way. The competitive evil of it would be largely eliminated through the universal application.

Senator BLACK. In other words, one employer would not have an advantage over another employer.

Mr. GREEN. No, sir.

Mr. Levy, a Rhode Island textile mill president, whose evidence I commend to those who are interested in this subject, made the following comment on wages:

Mr. LEVY. If this bill resulted merely in a reduction of hours and a commensurate reduction in wages, I should oppose it. This bill is valuable only if the hours are reduced and the compensation either remains where it is or is increased. I think logically it will follow if we find complete employment for our people, that wages must be paid that have some relation to the cost of living.

Mr. D. C. Henny, of Portland, Oreg., who is vice president of the American Society of Engineers and a member of the committee on production, distribution, and consumption of the American Engineering Council, who testified in favor of the bill, said as follows on this subject:

Mr. HENNY. I am trying to get at that point now. When there is a scarcity of labor, of course, labor will get a higher rate, which is to the advantage of labor. Labor then gets equal bargaining power with industry and capital. Competition will come about, and I agree with you if such a measure as this did not bring about better pay and higher consumptive power I would not be here, but I feel it is bound to do that.

Mr. T. S. Hogan, of Midland, Tex., who was formerly the secretary of state of Montana, testified in favor of the bill. An interesting colloquy occurred concerning the effect of this bill on wages. It was as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you a question. From your own experience and observation in Montana, when you were a member of the legislature and passed that 8-hour bill in Montana, did it decrease wages?

Mr. HOGAN. It did not. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. When the bill went into effect were the wages kept at the same for eight hours?

Mr. HOGAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. As they had been for a longer work period?

Mr. HOGAN. Yes. We had in the mines $3.50 a day for miners and muckers $3. That was not only maintained under the 8-hour schedule but very soon it was increased to $4 for miners and $3.50 for muckers, and none of the dire calamities which the spokesmen of the copper and lead industries predicted actually happened at all. They pointed out to us they could not compete with foreign goods, they could not compete with goods of the other States. The effect of this was the other States adopted the 8-hour system, as it will be in case of the adoption of your bill, Senator BLACK. It will come to be looked upon as orthodox and ordinary, as the 8-hour day is to-day, in a very short length of time. That is my opinion of how it will function.

Now, in response to the question of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] I will state that there was much other evidence given on this subject; and it was the unanimous opinion—with the exception, as I recall, of two men who appeared and who opposed the bill, and who favored overturning the Government by force, and one other witness who was the candidate of the Socialist-Labor Party for President in 1932—that it would result in holding up the standard of wages.

Now, let me go for just a moment to the additional cost of production, because we had evidence on that subject also. We hear people say that industry could not maintain itself if hours were shortened. Let us see what manufacturers said about that.

Quoting again from Mr. Levy, who operates woolen mills in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Virginia, he gave to the committee the estimated increased cost of a suit of clothes if factories worked on a 5-day week and 6-hour day and did not reduce present wages. Here is what he said:

I have been inquiring, Senator NORRIS, as to the objections to the bill. The first that occurs is a problem, and the certain increase in cost in all products, and I have sought to translate that into definite figures as bearing on the particular industry in which I am engaged, namely, the wool textile industry.

My company is engaged in taking raw wool as it comes from the sheep and transforming it into finished fabric, and distributing those finished fabrics to the people who make clothing from them. There are a number of ways of plant operation, and I shall give you the figures that have to do with the most unfavorable transition that would follow with this bill, and that is the change from a single operation of 48 hours per week to a single shift of 30 hours per week.

The additional cost in a suit of clothes for a man would be, as I calculate it, $1.08, a trifling amount indeed, when all the other factors in this situation are concerned.

Where other transitions are taken into consideration, the additional cost is very much less.

It is interesting to note that the decline in prices since 1929 has been so great due to the facts and circumstances that have been operating, a change which this bill hopes to meet and correct, that after those increases in cost, due to the operation of this bill, we would still have to add 67 per cent to the then increased cost in order to equal the existing prices in 1929.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that some say that industry can not stand the extra expense of a 5-day week and 6-hour day, we might reply by asking whether or not industry and business can stand the crushing burdens under which they rest to-day. Let Mr. Austin Levy answer this, as he did before our committee. I read from his evidence on that subject:

If people ask what is the cost of doing what the Black bill would require, we might well ask what is the cost to the Nation in dollars—let alone the other costs—what is the cost to the Nation of the present unemployment; and if we take as a conservative estimate that there are 10,000,000 people unemployed—the American Federation of Labor says it is almost 12,000,000, and I think we can agree on 10,000,000—I have built up the following calculation. Ten million unemployed at a standard wage of $5 a day means $50,000,000, as many more working half time, or a loss of $2.50 a day, is $25,000,000. So we have a daily loss of wages on this one count of $75,000,000, which in a 5-day week becomes $375,000,000.

We have, going on at the same time, a huge national expense for the relief of unemployment, and if we set that down to the modest sum of $2.50 a week, 7-day week, it is only 30 cents a day, or a little more, and it becomes $25,000,000 a week. We have the huge total as the direct cost of unemployment of $400,000,000 weekly, or $20,000,000,000 per annum.

Now that, Senator NORRIS, is only the direct cost. We have the indirect losses that follow on that through the loss in security values, through the loss in real-estate values, through the losses in commodity values, through the losses in savings. Our savings banks' losses constituted four million of deposits last year and 7,000,000 bank accounts were closed. We assume that those people used up their last funds when those 7,000,000 closed their savings-bank accounts. We must add, then, the losses in dividends, and the losses in interest, and when you have added all those things together, while the figures are impossible, I believe, to obtain, I believe they represent a far greater sum even than the direct loss of $20,000,000,000 per annum.

When we point to those figures the whole foreign debt becomes relatively insignificant. The whole export trade of this country becomes relatively unimportant. Here we have a market at our doors of $20,000,000,000 per annum. Where else in the world could we find such a market? Where else in the world does it exist?

That was the evidence of Mr. Levy in connection with the cost of the bill.

Now, I desire to give some of the striking statements of those who favored this bill and their reasons for so favoring it, and this is the last collection of evidence I obtained from the record.

Mr. Charles S. Rockwell, jr., who is treasurer of the largest plush manufacturing company in the world, operating mills in Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina, testified in favor of the bill. Let us find his reason from his own evidence:

Mr. ROCKWELL. It is rather hard to define why I am here, except that for some time it has been my opinion that we are producing more goods than we can possibly consume. I base my judgment on the period between 1920 and 1930, which I take is the most prosperous period of material prosperity that the United States has ever had.

* * * * * *

The textile industry, by the figures of the Department of Commerce and by figures of various of the manufacturing groups, did not work more than 60 per cent of a single 48-hour shift during this 10-year period of American prosperity.

I hope that will be noted, that the textile industry did not work more than 60 per cent of a single 48-hour shift during the 10-year period of American prosperity.

Now, if that amount of time is sufficient to produce all the goods that we can consume in a prosperous period, why, unless we recognize that fact with an attempt to give every person who is normally employed in that industry the opportunity of a job, we have failed to make ourselves any better or nearly as well off as the savage, who can produce what he needs in five hours a week and seems to get along pretty well.

We produce more goods than we can consume, and immediately the price falls, and there is a tremendous urge from the laboring man to the employer to give him work at any price which the employer wishes to pay, and I think it is remarkable in the last three years the employers have not cut wages more than they have. But it will be impossible to continue it much longer without cutting wages, simply trying to give two men where one man had worked before, along the recent statements of the share-the-work campaign. It simply means a man who is now on the charity list receives a job and takes away from the man who has a job part of his earnings. * * * I am basing my whole opinion on what we knew as a prosperous time, in which 40 per cent of the labor which should be normally employed in that industry was idle. Now, part of that labor was idle all the time and another part might have been idle 20 or 30 per cent of the time. Whether you pass a bill limiting the hours of labor to 30 hours a week or not, as long as the status quo—the volume of goods manufactured—remains the same you are going to have the same amount of idle time. This bill will not affect the total numbers of hours of idle time in the least, and I think it far better that everyone have the right to leisure time and everyone have the opportunity of a job than have 40 per cent of the people idle all the time.

Mr. Herman Aaron, an attorney of New York, representing the National Engineering Society, a number of large interests, and who described himself as a conservative, gave the following interesting reasons for favoring the bill:

I may say here that I am a firm believer in the principle that government regulation or interference of any sort should be avoided excepting when necessary. As a practical observer, however, it seems plain to me that it is hopeless for the competitive world to aspire to an effective limitation of hours of work through voluntary arrangement. To my mind the question, therefore, is, Shall we let our civilization crash through our disinclination to invoke the power of the law, or shall we resort to law to accomplish a vital rule of operation which it is not possible otherwise to create?

I say a vital rule with deliberation. How many of us sit in our easy chairs and smugly contemplate that millions of workers, able and willing to work, must seek in vain for an opportunity in this capitalistic world to earn their living and must see themselves and their families facing either starvation, or what is about as bad, being made objects of charity? No human person should permit such a condition to exist without doing his utmost to remedy it. If it is not remedied, does it take a prophet to foretell what will happen?

As I see no other recourse but a resort to the law, my proposal is that a national law be passed placing a limit upon the hours of labor in industry.

Our economist friends will be apt to deplore the wastefulness involved in the 6-hour suggestion. There is no wastefulness involved in it. The work of 800,000 men at six hours a day is the exact equivalent of the work of 600,000 men at eight hours a day, so that there is just as much wealth produced in the community under the happy system whereby a job is provided for everyone as under the unhappy system where industries are turned topsy-turvy and a large percentage of the community finds itself in distress and facing starvation or charity through no fault of themselves.

If all that is wanted can be made in six hours a day, why insist upon people working eight hours? I repeat, if all that is wanted can be made in six hours a day, why insist upon people working eight hours?

Mr. Max Baker, a silk manufacturer, gave the following reasons for his support of this bill:

My name is Max Baker. I am secretary of the American Raw Thrown Silk Association and secretary of the Silk Manufacturers Association, of Paterson, N. J.

I appear here to-day as a voluntary witness in this matter, representing a family which represents, probably, 3 per cent of the silk textile industry in production, and at the same time representing an organization in the city of Paterson, representing approximately 90 per cent of 531 manufacturers of which the city is made up.

I also appear here for certain manufacturers in the far East district, and also for certain manufacturers in the silk textile industry in the South.

My family has mills in the South, mills in Pennsylvania, mills in Paterson, and mills down East. After a study of this problem for the past two years we have sponsored exactly the legislation which Senator BLACK proposes here.

* * * * * * *

Our industry is in a chaotic condition. Labor conditions are fierce, and the owners' condition at the same time is fierce. I appear here for the owners of the industry in the city of Paterson, and for my own family and my friends in the industry whom I number amongst the thousands. * * *

From conversation with men in our industry, large and small, it is an impossibility for our industry to put its house in order by itself.

Mr. Hogan, of Midland, Tex., testified with reference to the necessity for the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator any statistics showing the number of persons who are on part-time employment in this country at the present time?

Mr. BLACK. We have the figures in the record. I did not gather those statistics for this occasion.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator from Massachusetts desires, I think I can give the figures.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. Lewis, representing the United Mine Workers, stated before a committee this morning that in certain industries the percentage of unemployment equals 40 per cent, and of 60 per cent of the enrolled workers employed a large part are employed on part-time basis. If that is true, the beneficial effect of the legislation which the Senator is advocating, and with which I am sympathetic, would not be so pronounced as we would ordinarily expect.

Mr. BLACK. That would be true were it not for the fact—and the Senator may have gone into it—that while the hours per week have decreased, the hours per day have increased, as I have pointed out from the evidence in the record. This gentleman whom I am quoting now, who is a silk manufacturer, says that they are working 17 hours a day in Paterson, N. J.; that the hours per day have gone up.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that is exceptional. Of course, that should be prevented, and the Senator is absolutely right in condemning it. My observation in my own State is that there are very few people in the industries working full time or extra hours per day.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct in saying that a great many people are working part time, but the disastrous thing about that part-time work—and I have many letters on my desk from people who have been compelled to do this thing—is that instead of reducing the hours per day and the hours per week, they have doubled up the work during the day on those who are toiling, they have increased the night work, and they are now working the employees by the hundreds of thousands 13½ hours per night.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is no doubt about the fact that the mad rush to produce commodities cheaply has resulted in breaking down all former standards of labor protection. This very morning Mr. Lewis testified that in most industries collective bargaining in the country, which has been a principle for which labor has fought for a long time, has disappeared as a result of conditions growing out of the depression.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. For fear there might be a misunderstanding on the part of a person reading the little colloquy which has just taken place, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to a fact which must not be overlooked, that the evidence before the committee showed is true, just as the Senator from Alabama has said; that employers are working men in the particular industry about which the Senator is now talking as much as 17 hours a day, running all the way from 8 or 9 up to 12 or 15, and even 17 hours. A person might get the idea that they were overcrowded with orders, but the evidence shows the condition is just the reverse. While they work their employees so many hours a day, they probably will be without work after a few days' work or a few weeks' work, for two or three months.

It comes about from the fact that on account of the depression and the fear of investing in something that might go down in price after it is bought, the manufacturing takes place after the orders have been placed. Goods are not made up and put on the shelves, but the man sells his goods, takes his orders, and manufactures afterwards. Then the orders which come in are in the nature of rush orders. The manufacturers are afraid to manufacture and keep a stock on hand because of the condition that now exists. If prices go down, as they have been going all the time, they would not be able to sell, of course. The men are working long hours, yet in the aggregate they are not working enough to support themselves and their families.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In conjunction with what the Senator from Nebraska stated, the situation to which he referred was very pronouncedly shown by what happened to the woolen industry last fall. The clothing makers of the country held back until the very last minute in selecting their woolen fabrics. There was a delay of weeks. Finally, they made their selections and every woolen mill started to work day and night and continued for several weeks. It appeared to be one of the biggest booms the woolen mills had had for a long time. But it soon developed that it was only for a few weeks. The mills all shut down in a few weeks after the delayed seasonal activities.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Green, who testified before the committee and who took into consideration days on part time, had a study made by statisticians connected with his organization and reached the conclusion that the application of the 5-day week and the 6-hour day would employ six and one-half million more people.

Now let us see what Mr. Hogan, of Midland, Tex., said in favoring the bill. I desire to call attention to it so that the Senate may know the viewpoint of some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee. Mr. Hogan said:

> I bring that up here merely for the purpose of impressing on you that the only trouble with your bill is that you are two years too late. During the past two years I have traveled through about 30 of the States of the Union, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Canadian border to the South. I have seen at least eight riots, any one of which, with the vigorous leadership of a man like the gentleman who appeared before you last week, might have resulted in the capture of the city. I try not to be an alarmist, but it is the result of my profound conviction that you have not got even one year in which to adjust the economic conditions of this Nation to divert a full and complete upheaval. Legislation through representative government is on trial, and I want to say that my own judgment on the work of the session, with a few notable and honorable exceptions, is decidedly distressing to one who hopes for progress.
> In the farm situation it is already too late to reach them by any farm relief measures; at least it is too late to beat the dispossessed.

Mr. John Edelman, the research director of the American Federation of Full-Fashioned Hosiery Workers, of Philadelphia, testified before the committee. In concluding his testimony the following testimony was given:

> Senator BLACK. What importance do you attach to this measure as part of a program to restore business conditions and give employment?
>
> Mr. EDELMAN. I think it is of elementary, primary, and paramount importance.
>
> Senator BLACK. Do you believe conditions can be restored without limiting the hours of labor?
> Mr. EDELMAN. Absolutely not. We believe that the present condition of chaos will very rapidly become so serious, unless something of this sort is done, that the measure that would have to be adopted to correct it would be much more drastic than anything now being contemplated.

Mr. Phillip Murray, vice president of the United Mine Workers of America, gave the following statement with reference to the necessity of passing the bill:

> The 6-hour day is inevitable. New inventions, new processes, new methods, new machines have been, and are, and in the years to come, will produce an ever-increasing amount of technological unemployment. Hours of labor must be reduced as productivity increases. But although inevitable, the 6-hour day may not be universally adopted for many years unless some mandatory legislation is enacted into law, for the simple reason that no individual employer will voluntarily take action that hampers competition in the complex business world. But action mandatory upon all will be welcomed, and if it can be made effective now, it will exercise a tremendous influence in stabilizing industry and by increasing the consumptive ability of the country will lift us out of the morass in which we are now floundering. * * * If the industrial processes of this country are so highly geared that the requirement and hours of human labor must be reduced, it is obviously better to distribute the resulting leisure among employed citizens than to have a vast number of unemployed even in normal times and millions of jobless men in recurring cycles.
> I do not desire to dwell upon this phase of the subject because it is so obvious that it has been already fully discussed. But I do want to call the attention of the committee to one matter, and that is the disintegration of character during long periods of enforced idleness. During the first few months of unemployment men will zealously hunt for work. They want to keep their economic independence. They do not want to become objects of charity. Consciously or unconsciously they seek to maintain their relations as normal citizens toward society. But the time comes when many of these men become accustomed to charity or in desperation join the ranks of the hobo and the criminal. During a depression such as we have experienced for the last three and one-half years, who can estimate the number of people who have become reconciled to charity, professional pensioners on the public bounty, or professional hobos and criminals? The man who is hungry and who can find no work either revolts against society or adjusts himself to life as a social parasite.

When the individual revolts against society it is a matter of minor importance. Society is organized to protect itself against him, but when millions of our people are driven into this situation it becomes a matter of serious moment. If the individual farmer loses his farm for nonpayment of taxes or default on his mortgage, it may be regarded simply as an incident in our national economy. But when farmers of entire counties and of States see their farms sold under the hammer for unpaid mortgages and tax liens they take the law in their own hands. And desperate as the plight of the farmer is, it has not yet reached the point of hunger.

Mr. Clarence A. Miller, an attorney who appeared in opposition to the bill, basing his objection on constitutional grounds, testified with reference to the desirability of the relief proposed. I call attention to this because it is significant, but in practically every instance even those who appeared against the bill for one reason or another, expressed themselves as favoring the objective at which it is aimed. Mr. Miller was asked:

Senator BLACK. You favor the objective of this bill?
Mr. MILLER. Yes, Senator; I favor the objective of this bill.
Senator BLACK. And you think it should be done in some way?
Mr. MILLER. Yes; in some way. I have been sincerely doubtful as to whether you are proposing to do it in a constitutional way. * * * I might go further and say in my humble opinion it would be absolutely impossible to accomplish this by individual State regulation, by reason of competitive conditions. In other words, I think you all agree Pennsylvania would not regulate the hours of labor in coal mines unless Ohio, Indiana, and all the competitive States did likewise.
Senator BLACK. It is also evident it can not be done by unanimous agreement of the manufacturers themselves, is it not?
Mr. MILLER. That is also true.

I call attention to the fact that Mr. Miller was appearing as attorney for interests in opposition to the bill. Mr. Miller said further:

I do not believe we will ever have anything approaching a uniform regulation of hours of labor except by a Federal statute, and I believe you will ultimately find it is going to be not only desirable but necessary to get a constitutional amendment to bring that about.

Mr. S. Odenheimer, president of the Lane Cotton Mills, of New Orleans, La., said during the hearing:

It requires now the strong arm of the Government to overcome conditions as they are to-day; not only to-day but conditions as they will be from now on.

We have now more people that require work at long hours than we have occupations. We have to find a way—and have to do that very quickly—to employ everybody that wants to work and employ everybody every week in the year. The reason is plain. First, your main reason, every man under the sun has a right; every man who wants to work should be given the opportunity to work. * * * What will become of the minds of your sons if the condition is they can not get work because the employers keep the labor that they have. If they send them off, they do not employ new ones. What becomes of their minds? Is it not about time we think that we have something to regulate by government because that is the only regulation that amounts to anything? That is so detrimental to American institutions, detrimental to the minds of the people, to our citizens, so there is nothing else for us, as I see it, but to put everybody to work; and don't let us wait until people take the law in their own hands and take what they think belongs to them.

Lest Senators may misunderstand, this was no communist. He is not a man who seeks to overturn the Government. He operates one of the largest cotton mills in the South and one of the oldest in the Union. Since the hearing has been held I have had telegrams from him, one of which arrived this morning, calling attention to the urgent necessity for quick action in order to obtain employment for the people of the Nation. The people are not going to be put back to work by balancing the Budget. I would not underestimate the importance of attempting to balance the Budget; but the people are not going to be put back to work that way. Here is a man who has been engaged in manufacturing, in the cotton-mill business, for a long period of years, who has sent me telegrams and made statements to me, some of which I would not dare to read into the RECORD, calling attention to the fact that something must be done, and that something must be done without delay.

Now, let us see what Mr. Joseph Haines, jr., of Philadelphia, said. He gave the following reasons for favoring a national law regulating hours of labor:

Senator BLACK. As a manufacturer you favor this national law regulating the hours of labor?
Mr. HAINES. Yes.
Senator BLACK. Why?
Mr. HAINES. Well, I think, as I previously stated, it will inflate wages.
Senator BLACK. You mean inflate wages—it will increase wages?
Mr. HAINES. Yes.
Senator BLACK. All right.
Mr. HAINES. And that it will make for a better hosiery market and a more profitable industry.

There is a man who is president of a string of factories manufacturing hosiery. This gentleman came down here voluntarily. He came in order to plead with the Senate to adopt regulations for shorter hours in industry, one of the only ways possible to bring back a rehabilitation of economic conditions in the United States.

Senator BLACK. You believe, in other words, you have to have purchasers in order to be able to sell?
Mr. HAINES. Exactly. We have to eliminate as equitably as possible our overproduction, to encourage manufacturers to get a fair return on their investment and their efforts, and to divide an additional share of that reward with our employees.

Mr. Frederic Brenckman, appearing as the national representative of the National Grange, in favor of the bill, testified as follows:

While I am not minimizing the disastrous effects to agriculture by the shrinkage of our export trade, the fact is, the farmer lost one-fourth of his home markets because of the lack of purchasing power on the part of the unemployed in our cities and towns, and to my mind that is infinitely worse than the loss of our export trade. Put the unemployed back to work and those who are now in the bread lines or living on short rations, subsisting on as little as possible, will begin to buy ham and eggs, beefsteak and potatoes, vegetables and dairy products, cotton and woolen goods. This will create a demand for farm products which does not now exist. Hand in hand with increased demand will come better prices for the products of our farms. That is what is desperately needed to restore prosperity to our fundamental industry.

Within proper bounds, it is sound policy to engage in the construction of public works in order to take up the slack in periods of depression, but it is manifest that more than that is necessary to meet the existing emergency, which is without parallel in our history. There can be no doubt that the use of labor-saving machinery and the methods of mass production have contributed greatly to bring about the present situation. Even prior to the beginning of the depression, several million people were the victims of technological unemployment. * * *

Nobody in his right senses would want to scrap labor-saving machinery or do away with improved methods of production, but it is manifest that our civilization is going to break down unless we make it possible for every man who is willing and able to work to have a job at which he can earn the necessaries of life for himself and his dependents.

Mass production and mass consumption must go hand in hand or trouble is bound to result, just as is the case to-day.

Mr. John P. Frey, who was one of the most interesting witnesses we had before the committee, the secretary-treasurer of the metal-trades department of the American Federation of Labor, gave the following reasons for favoring this bill:

Personally I have always been opposed, up to the present time, to regulating terms of employment through legislation. I have believed that there was enough intelligence, enough of a desire to maintain intelligent conditions, which would lead leaders of industry, when major problems arose, to confer with labor to work out an adjustment of the problem. I have become convinced that is impossible. While there are many employers who heartily believe in sitting down with their employees and endeavoring to work out their problems, there is an influence in the country to-day which makes it impossible for many of the smaller employers and heads of our corporations to sit down in private for the purpose of working out a problem of the distribution of employment, the distribution of wealth in the form of wages.

I have reached the conclusion that the railroads are not free to sit down with the representatives of the railway employees and work out their problems as employer and wage earner. I am convinced that our large manufacturing corporations are no longer free to sit down with their employees and work out their employment problems.

I have become convinced that the banker has established a position in this country where he determines whether employers will sit down with their employees to work out these problems, and it is because I have reached that conclusion that I believe the only way that we can have any intelligent regulation of employment is through such a measure as the bill that I am now discussing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Alabama has been very generous in yielding, and I am afraid my question may not pertain to the matter which he is at this moment discussing. However, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether or not his proposal was submitted to the Secretary of Labor for his views?

Mr. BLACK. The Secretary of Labor was invited to come before the committee and testify, but he did not appear before the committee. A letter appears in the record, as I recall, in which it is stated that he was busily engaged in something else and could not appear before the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator have the hearings of the committee before him?

Mr. BLACK. I do not have the printed hearings; they have not all as yet been printed.

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary of Labor did not write a letter. As chairman of the committee, I wrote a letter to the Secretary of Labor, and I would be glad if we had it here and to have the Senator read it, if he desires to do so.

Mr. BLACK. I will be glad to read it, if the Senator will send for it, because I expect to speak about five minutes more.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let me ask the Senator from Nebraska if he received a reply to that letter.

Mr. NORRIS. I received no reply; but I stated—and it is in the hearings—that the Secretary's office, his secretary, called up my office and stated that the letter was received, but the Secretary was too busy; he could not appear before the committee. He did not express any opinion; I received no expression whatever from the Secretary of Labor as to his attitude on the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Alabama that only yesterday, at a meeting of the Committee on Education and Labor, there was under consideration a labor bill in which many people in the building industry are very much interested. Inquiry was made as to whether the Secretary of Labor had expressed his views on the bill. The reply was that he had not. In view of these incidents, I am wondering if the Labor Department of the Government has stopped functioning during this depression.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, that is as far as I shall go to-day in a review of the evidence. I do so reluctantly, by reason of my desire to aid in the expedition of the pending legislation. I have taken very little time of the Senate during the present session, and I would not have taken this time on the measure I have discussed had I not believed that it is one of a very few proposals which have been offered striking at the vital and fundamental defects in the operation of our system to-day, which are responsible for the widespread distress.

We are now to take up a bill which will provide assistance to those in hunger and in want and in misery. What will emerge as a result of our consideration of that bill I do not know; but I do know, without deprecating to the slightest extent the desirability of feeding our people, and standing here as one of those who believe in seeing that the people shall be fed, it seems to me bad that we are not taking a more vigorous attitude with reference to legislation that will attempt to cure the disease. We must, of course, treat the symptoms; that must be done; we can not in this country in the midst of abundance and plenty sit silently by, while people all over the Nation are hungry and cold, and decline to administer to their wants. How important it is, Mr. President, that as we contemplate these conditions we remember that it is an inherent right of every man to claim of his government that in the operation of its affairs man-made law shall not deprive him of the opportunity to earn his daily bread by the sweat of his brow. That is what we have been doing.

There are two or three measures that are absolutely vital for either this session or the special session of Congress to consider in order that there may be some hope given to the people of this Nation. Business leaders have failed. For four years we have waited for that prosperity which was to come around the corner. Some think they can not help; some think they can help, but will not help. Whichever view is correct, the fact remains that since 1929 the number of people hopelessly tramping the highways of this Nation has steadily and with regularity and uniformity mounted higher and higher, until to-day the president of the American Federation of Labor estimates there are 12,000,000 unemployed, and a research bureau in New York gave out figures on Sunday estimating that there were 17,000,000 unemployed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am sure the able Senator, who has been discussing with a good deal of eloquence and some little emotion a very important problem, did not mean to convey the idea that the obligation does not, in part at least, and in great part, rest upon the States, counties, and municipalities to look after the people within their own borders. It seems to me, as I have listened to the Senator, though, the thought would be forced into the minds of most persons who have heard him that the sole obligation rested upon the Federal Government. The Senator is a Democrat and has regard for the States and their obligations and for municipalities and their obligations, and regards the States as sovereign within their sphere; and certainly, with those views, which have been uppermost in his mind for many, many years, he can not contend that the States and their political subdivisions may devolve upon the Federal Government the sole responsibility, because if the Federal Government does assume it, it has to reach back to the States and the people within the States and take from them the taxes, the property, with which to carry on the charitable activities for which the Senator is contending.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I did not mean to leave the impression that the Federal Government should take the sole responsibility for seeing that people do not starve. I do not think it should; I have never thought it should. We built up in this country a system of taking care of the poor in the main by tax-raised money. We have been able, until the past few months, to continue that system. The fact remains, however, that with the present deplorable condition of business, with the insolvency of the farmer, with the bankruptcy of the merchant, with banks toppling all around, we have been compelled to adopt the method of mobilizing our forces all over the land from the East to the West and from the North to the South in order to take care of the people who live under our flag.

There is nothing that would lead me to believe that all the wealth produced in Alabama remains in Alabama; I know it does not. There is nothing that would lead me to believe that all the wealth produced in Utah remains in Utah; I know it does not. I do know that in the city in which I live in Alabama, where thousands of people are being fed, where voluntary contributions were sought in that city, the smallest proportion of contributions made came from business enterprises with their headquarters in distant States, that had been siphoning the wealth created and produced by the people of Alabama and burying it in holding-company banks, where the manipulators of finance and the barons of trade preside over the destinies of the people of this Nation.

I know further that, as shown by the evidence before the committee, the destinies of the various individual business enterprises are not controlled by the lieutenants who sit at their heads; they are controlled, on the contrary, by the great banking enterprises, few in number, who have monopolized the credit, the money, and the wealth of the people of this Nation, under the control of a few, as shown before the committee, who control, through their interlocking directorships, perhaps 90 per cent of the various industrial activities of this Nation operating in every State in the Union.

So, Mr. President, in so far as I am concerned, I stand on the old principles of government so long as those principles function and those principles operate; I believe in giving the maximum amount of power to the sovereign State which that State can exercise with justice to its people and in the protection of their rights; but to-day business knows no State lines. It stands as indicated by a few giant monopolies, with their tentacles reaching out into every precinct of every county of every State in this Union, determining the destinies of our people. The evidence before the committee shows the utter impossibility and futility of attempting to obtain regulation of hours of labor by State activities or by agreements of the manufacturers. The evidence of manufacturers shows it. The evidence of economists shows it. The evidence of merchants shows it. All show the same thing—that if it is desirable to reduce the hours of labor in industry, there is one and only one power in America strong enough to bring it about, and that is the arm of the Federal Government.

If it be true, as witnesses testifying before our committee believe, that the commerce of this Nation is being infected with goods produced in a way and in a manner which threatens to undermine the very civilization in which we live, which lengthens the bread line, which adds to human misery, which subtracts from the sum total of human happiness, then I say that the Federal Government has the right, the power, and the duty to enact such legislation as will prevent such a catastrophe from occurring.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. I was interested in the question which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] propounded to the Senator from Alabama, to the effect that it ought to be the duty and responsibility of the several States to relieve the condition in which they now find themselves.

That might be true if the States were responsible for bringing about the condition. I desire to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, this condition has not been brought about largely by the Federal laws that are now in force and the use of them by those that have brought about this condition, and therefore if the responsibility is not on the Federal Government to relieve the condition that it allowed to be brought about and was solely responsible for?

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that in my judgment it has been largely brought about by the Federal laws that are now in force and the Federal laws that are not now in force.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLACK. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to make an observation here, with the permission of the Senator. It is suggested mainly by the question of the Senator from Utah. The question did not seem to me to comprehend the bill which the Senator from Alabama is discussing.

This is a bill providing for a 6-hour day and a 5-day week. Nobody contends—so far as I know, nobody has ever suggested—that, assuming it to be desirable to bring about this condition, any State has the power to do it.

It is well recognized that if one State—for instance, in the coal business, the State of Pennsylvania, as suggested by the Senator himself earlier in his remarks—should fix that kind of a day, it would fail absolutely unless Ohio and Kentucky and Tennessee and West Virginia and the other States that were producing coal should fix the same kind of a day. Nobody has contended for a moment before the committee that if we desire to shorten the day and the week there is any power on earth that can do it in this country except the Federal Government.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am sure the Senator from Alabama is to be commended for this discussion this morning.

A few moments ago he made some comment about our major activities being centered in what might be termed one management, which, in other words, is nothing more nor less than monopoly.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to two or three bills now pending before the Congress and two propositions that are pending before the country. The first is the so-called branch banking bill. Does not the Senator believe that that bill will have a tendency to center the financial resources of the Nation in a few central banks in our large cities?

Mr. BLACK. As to that feature of the bill, I agree with the Senator fully.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Has the Senator seen the report of the unofficial commission appointed to make a survey of our railroad situation and their statement that eventually, if their recommendation is carried out, we shall have one railway system for the entire United States? And if that is carried out, is not that another evidence of the tendency to centralize our major activities under one control?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. May I call the Senator's attention to a news story appearing, I think, in yesterday's Washington Daily News? This news story is by Mr. Ray Tucker. It contains two alleged quotations from two senatorial leaders that I think should be made public at an early date.

One of these is a purported interview with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], in which Mr. Tucker construes his opinion as follows:

> In his opinion, recovery can be hastened by permitting unstable, unnecessary, and inefficient corporations to fail, thereby reducing the burden of debt piled up on an artificial level in the boom years.

The second quotation is Mr. Tucker's interpretation of a statement made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which Mr. Tucker interprets in his interview as follows:

> He thinks the effort to save many corporations and institutions by pouring good money after bad has postponed recovery.

There are two statements, if I may suggest to the Senator from Alabama, which clearly lead to the conclusion that the efforts of some of these big concerns are not to check the downward trend of this depression but to continue it. We have too many banks still that are weak that should fail. We have too many corporations now that should fail. We have too many employed people. We are paying too high salaries. Before we can reach the end of this depression these weak banks must fail; these weak corporations must fail; these employees who are getting unreasonable salaries must be reduced in salary; and even some of the folks who are now upon some pay roll must lose their positions before we can get to the end of this depression.

Does the Senator entertain views along that line?

Mr. BLACK. I do not believe in the liquidation of labor. It is my judgment that there are a number of important things that must be considered in connection with any program. I referred to those, and referred to the instability and the shifting value of the American dollar as one of them. We must take care of the indebtedness of the people in some way so that they will not be dispossessed of all they have and thrown out at a time when their property is worth so much less than it was before.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama further yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Hearings are now in progress before the Finance Committee. Some of the eminent gentlemen who are testifying before that committee are recommending, as a relief measure, that we adjust our indebtedness; that farmers who can not pay their farm mortgages be afforded some opportunity to cut down those mortgages by an adjustment between themselves and their creditors.

Does not the Senator believe that if this program is sound it should extend to the indebtedness of the cities; that if the individual is to have his indebtedness reduced by mutual agreement the cities likewise should have their bonded indebtedness reduced; that the counties should be afforded the same opportunity, likewise the States and even the Federal Government? If we have more bonds outstanding than we can pay—and adjustment, if good for an individual, should be good for the city, good for the State, and even good for the Federal Government.

In other words, is it fair to the people, if we start this program of relief, not to carry it from the top to the bottom, and make the adjustment all up and down the line?

Mr. BLACK. I think the question of the Senator answers itself. Undoubtedly, if relief is granted to one group of people it should be granted to others.

Now, Mr. President, concluding my remarks, I desire to say that nothing except my idea of the paramount importance of this bill would have caused me to speak at this time. The subcommittee, in my judgment, will favorably report this measure to the full committee on next Monday. It is my purpose at that time to attempt to obtain action by the Judiciary Committee. I believe that any program of rehabilitation that eliminates this idea from consideration will fail. Other things must be taken into consideration. The able efforts made by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] in connection with unemployment insurance, and his discussion of the various social activities in which the people or the governments must engage, should and will attract the attention of the Senate and of the country.

Too little of security has been given to the men who toil. As they looked out before them in this system of ours, they could see themselves thrown off and discarded at a comparatively early age. It has been impossible for them to accumulate enough out of their earnings to prepare for those times. Those are subjects that must be considered, and we must arrange in the future some way to give security in the way of employment and income.

Mr. President, this and other measures are but the beginning of an effort to bring about a more equal and exact justice under our system from one who believes in our civilization and believes in perpetuating its existence. Just as certainly as we are here, this is no time for blind leaders, people who can not see conditions, to ignore the inevitable fact that when 12,000,000 people out of our population are out of work, it behooves us to move, and move boldly. We can not stand at a position merely because we have stood there before. We must attempt to move, and to equalize the injustices that have been perpetuated and brought down upon our heads, in my judgment, not by the people of an individual State but by the small group testified to by Mr. Frey in the hearings before this committee.

So, Mr. President, I desire to state with reference to Mr. Frey's evidence that I shall not discuss it now; but it is my hope that in the near future there will be a thorough and searching scrutiny and investigation of the interlocking directorships of the small group that have set themselves up as the financial, economic, and governmental dictators of this Nation, in order that they may be stripped of their power, which, in my judgment, has been used to crush the average men and women of this country. I might say further that in my judgment that group is more responsible than any other one power in all the land for the condition in which America finds herself to-day, with her people starving in the midst of the greatest abundance the world has ever known.

I want it distinctly understood that this bill was introduced for the purpose of passing. It will be urged at the earliest possible moment; and I hope that when this body does act upon the bill it will enact it, and enact it speedily, because I believe that our civilization is now on trial.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, undoubtedly the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has presented some figures showing the extent to which our workers are obliged to work part time during this depression. I have some accurate and definite figures before me that I present for the RECORD at this time.

The city of Worcester is the second largest city in Massachusetts. It has a population of a little under 200,000 people. Its industries are diversified. There are several machine shops, there is a large plant of the American Wire Co., a large loom works, a shoe factory or two, some woolen factories; in fact, there is almost every kind of an industrial plant that is found in the eastern part of our country. As cities go, I should say that Worcester was somewhat more prosperous than the average New England community.

The Worcester Bank & Trust Co. publishes monthly some statistics in a pamphlet called "Business Review of Worcester." They give, among other statistics, the employment figures, and the employment figures show that in October of 1929 the highest point was reached in employment. At that time in 42 city industrial plants there were 22,428 employees, working 4,711,418 hours. The latest available figures are for December, 1932. The employees at that time numbered 15,549. It is to be noted that that is a decrease of approximately 7,000 as against the peak year of 1929. The number of working hours amounted to 2,299,514, as against 4,711,418 working hours in 1929, representing a decrease in the working hours of more than 50 per cent, while the decrease in the number of employees was somewhat less.

Mr. President, turning to the industrial pay roll of the city of Worcester, based on January, 1928—having a pay roll which is fixed, for the purpose of making comparison, at 100 per cent—we find that the pay roll in the city of Worcester in December, 1932, had shrunken to 48.8 per cent as compared with January, 1928. The Worcester general pay-roll index had shrunken from a pay roll for January, 1928, of 100 per cent to 40.2 per cent in January, 1933, a drop of practically 60 per cent in the general pay-roll index of the city of Worcester.

I take the time of the Senate to present these figures because they are accurate, published by an institution which would try, for the sake of retaining confidence in its own institution and promoting business, to make the most favorable report possible. I have observed for some time that these reports all show a steady, constant decline month by month since 1929 in all the indexes reported.

LABOR CONDITIONS ON MISSISSIPPI FLOOD-CONTROL PROJECTS

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 300, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be reported.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 300) submitted by Mr. WAGNER on December 12, 1932.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it proposed now to take up that resolution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; I do not think it will lead to discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the resolution should go over until a better opportunity may be afforded to consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution goes to the calendar.

FEDERAL AID FOR UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Manufactures with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, as follows:

That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to cooperate more effectively with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in furnishing relief to their needy and distressed people and in relieving the hardship resulting from unemployment.

SEC. 2. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make available out of the funds of the corporation not to exceed $500,000,000 for payments to the States for emergency relief expenditures and for other expenditures authorized under the provisions of this act, upon certification by the Federal Emergency Relief Board created by section 3.

(b) To enable the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to obtain funds for the purposes of this act, the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the corporation is authorized and empowered under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, as amended, to have outstanding at any one time is increased by $500,000,000.

(c) Ten days after the date upon which a majority of the members of the Federal Emergency Relief Board have qualified and have taken office, no application for funds shall be approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the provisions of Title I of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932, and the Federal Emergency Relief Board shall have access to all files and records of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation relating to the administration of emergency relief under Title I of such act.

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby created a Federal Emergency Relief Board (referred to in this act as the "board"), which shall consist of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two of whom shall be experienced in public welfare and relief administration. The board shall have full power of apportionment and allotment of funds under the provisions of this act. The President shall designate one of the members of the board as its chairman. The members of the board shall receive no compensation for their services, except that they shall be paid a per diem compensation of $25 for time devoted to the work of the board, and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. The board shall cease to exist upon the expiration of two years after the date of the enactment of this act.

(b) The board—

(1) Shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this act; and

(2) Shall print monthly for public distribution and shall submit to the President and to the Senate and the House of Representatives (or to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a report of its activities and expenditures. Such reports shall, when submitted, be printed as public documents.

(c) The board may appoint and fix the compensation of an executive officer and such experts and, subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, appoint, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, fix the compensation of such other officers and employees, as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act; and may make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere and for printing and binding), not to exceed $350,000, as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. All expenses of the board shall be paid out of the amount made available for that purpose by section 4 (b)

(d) The board may appoint advisory committees to advise and confer with it with respect to the administration of this act. No salary shall be paid to committee members, but when attending meetings of the board they shall be allowed necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government.

SEC. 4. (a) Forty per cent of the amount made available under section 2 (a) of this act shall be apportioned among the States on the basis of population according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census. Payments made in any year out of the amount apportioned to any State on the basis of population shall not be in excess of two-thirds of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available for such year by the State (or, in the case of the District of Columbia, appropriated by the Congress for use therein), by the civil subdivisions thereof and/or by private contributions from within the State, for emergency relief as defined in section 11 of this act.

(b) The balance of the amount made available under section 2 (a) of this act shall be set aside as a reserve fund for emergency allotments as provided in section 8; except that not to exceed $350,000 of such balance may be used for administrative expenses of the board under this act, which shall be paid by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation upon presentation of vouchers approved by the Federal Emergency Relief Board.

(c) The amounts apportioned or allotted to any State under this act shall be available for payment to and expenditure by such State, for the purposes of this act, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act; except that at the expiration of the fiscal year 1933, if the amount certified prior to the expiration of such year for payment to any State out of amounts apportioned on the basis of population under this act is less than one-half of the total amount apportioned to that State on the basis of population, the difference between the amount so certified and one-half of the total amount apportioned shall be added to the reserve fund provided for in subsection (b) of this section and shall be available for allotment to the several States on the basis of need.

SEC. 5. (a) In order to obtain payments out of the amount made available under section 2 (a) of this act a State, through its governor, shall designate or create an agency to cooperate with the board.

(b) Relief shall be administered within each State under rules and regulations adopted by the State agency.

SEC. 6. Any State desiring to obtain funds under this act shall, by the agency designated or created to cooperate with the board, make application therefor from time to time and submit at such times and for such periods as may be prescribed by the board plans for carrying out the provision of this act within such State. The plans shall include (1) information as to the amounts actually expended for emergency relief by public and private agencies in the State for such periods as the board may prescribe; (2) estimates of the amounts appropriated or otherwise available for emergency relief needs within the State for the period covered by such plan or plans; (3) estimates of amounts necessary to meet the emergency relief needs in the State in the calendar year 1933, and, upon call of the board, in the calendar year 1934; (4) provision for adequate administrative personnel; and (5) provision for securing the benefits contemplated by this act to persons within the State, irrespective of the period of residence within the State. When the board determines that such plans are in conformity with the provisions of this act and reasonably appropriate and adequate to carry out its purposes, they shall be approved by the board, and due notice of such approval shall be given to the State agency.

SEC. 7. Within 10 days after the date upon which a majority of the members of the board have qualified and have taken office, the board shall make the apportionment on the basis of population provided in section 4 (a). After application by any State and approval of its plans as provided in section 6 of this act, the board shall immediately certify to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the amount to be paid to such State.

SEC. 8. (a) Whenever, from an application presented by a State agency and verified by the board, the board finds that the combined moneys available within the State from all sources, supplemented by any moneys to be paid to the State under section 4 (a), will fall below the estimated needs for emergency relief in any State, the State shall be eligible for an emergency allotment on the basis of need from the reserve fund provided in section 4 (b); but no such allotment shall be made to any State unless the board is satisfied that the State or its political subdivisions have made reasonable efforts within their resources to provide for emergency relief expenditures. The board shall, from time to time, certify the amounts to be paid under this subsection.

(b) The board is authorized to allot to the States not to exceed $15,000,000 out of the reserve fund, to be used in furnishing relief and in maintaining work and training programs for persons who have no legal claim on the State or the local community for such assistance.

(c) Any State desiring to receive funds under subsection (b) of this section shall submit to the board through its designated relief agency an application which shall set forth, in the manner prescribed by the board, the extent of the need for service to transients, and a detailed plan for administering relief, and for work and training programs, for transients. In considering such application the board shall determine whether sufficient need has been demonstrated, and whether the plans submitted will, if put into effect, actually relieve distress among transients, assist in their rehabilitation, and tend to decrease the transient problem. If the board finds that need has been demonstrated and approves the plan, it shall certify to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the sum or sums which it approves for payment to the State. For the purpose of this section a transient is a person within the borders of a State who has no legal residence within that State.

SEC. 9. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall make payments without delay to the several States in such amounts and at such times as the Federal Emergency Relief Board may certify under sections 7 and 8 of this act, but no payment shall be made pursuant to certificate which has been revoked by the board as provided in section 10.

SEC. 10. Each State agency cooperating with the board under the provisions of this act shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed or requested by the board. The board may revoke any existing certificate or withhold any further certificate under this act whenever it shall determine, as to any State, that the State agency has not properly expended or supervised the expenditure of moneys paid to it in accordance with the plans approved under this act. Before any such certificate shall be revoked or withheld from any State the board shall give notice in writing to the State agency stating specifically wherein the State has failed to comply with such plans.

SEC. 11. The term "emergency relief," when used in this act, means relief in the form of money or commodities or services furnished by the State or its civil subdivisions or by private contributions from within the State to persons in their abode or habitation, or for the transient and homeless, or in the form of wages or other compensation for work furnished on the basis of need, but not including old-age pensions under special acts, or public aid under special acts to mothers for the care of dependent children, or relief to veterans under special acts. The decision of the board as to the purpose of any expenditure shall be final.

SEC. 12. This act shall be construed as intending to secure to the several States control of the administration of relief under this act within their respective territorial limits, subject only to the provisions and purposes of this act.

SEC. 13. The term "State" as used in this act shall include the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico, and in the case of the District of Columbia the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall designate the agency to cooperate with the board.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 12, after line 20, the Senator from New York proposes to insert:

"TITLE I—RELIEF OF DESTITUTION"

On page 21, after line 15, insert:

"TITLE II—AMENDMENTS TO EMERGENCY RELIEF AND CONSTRUCTION ACT OF 1932

"SEC. 21. Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 201 of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'(1) to make loans to or contracts with States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, public agencies of States, of municipalities, and of political subdivisions of States, public corporations, boards and commissions, and public municipal instrumentalities of one or more States, to aid in financing the construction, reconstruction, replacement, extension, or improvement of projects authorized under Federal, State, or municipal law which, in the opinion of the corporation, are needful and in the public interest, such loans or contracts to be made through the purchase of their securities, or otherwise, and for such purpose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to bid for such securities: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph, from purchasing securities having a maturity of more than 10 years; '

"SEC. 22. Paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of section 201 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"'(3) to make loans to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction, replacement, or improvement of aircraft suitable for overseas transport and port facilities essential thereto, bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, canals, and markets, devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character and to make loans to private corporations formed wholly for the purpose of developing cooperative community farming and crop marketing to aid in financing projects undertaken by such corporations which are self-liquidating in character; '

"SEC. 23. Subsection (a) of section 201 of such act is further amended by striking out '(other than by taxation).'

"SEC. 24. Subsections (c) and (d) of section 201 of such act are amended to read as follows:

"'(c) In order that the surpluses of agricultural commodities and livestock (including products manufactured directly therefrom) may not have a depressing effect upon current prices of such commodities and products, the corporation is authorized and directed to make loans, in such amounts as may in its judgment be necessary, for the purpose of financing sales of such surpluses in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce; but no such sales shall be financed by the corporation if, in its judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such commodities and products: Provided, however, That no such loan shall be made to finance the sale in the markets of foreign countries of cotton owned by the Federal Farm Board or the Cotton Stabilization Corporation.

"'(d) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans to bona fide institutions, organized under the laws of any State or of the United States and having resources adequate for their undertakings, for the purpose of enabling them to finance the carrying and orderly marketing of agricultural commodities and livestock produced in the United States, and the products manufactured directly therefrom.'

"SEC. 25. Subsection (f) of section 201 of such act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: 'but in determining the adequacy of security offered by a borrower applying under subsection (a) of this section the board may, in its discretion, accept as adequate security under this section, a lien on, or other satisfactory assurances of the application of, so much of the revenues from the project as may be required to meet interest payments during the period of the loan and assure refunding within a reasonable period: Provided further, That each loan made under paragraphs (1) to (5) of subsection (a) of this section after this subsection, as amended, takes effect, shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent more than the rate of interest established for the last issue of bonds of the United States preceding the making of such loan.'

"SEC. 26. The second proviso of subsection (g) of section 201 of such act is amended by striking out '(1) or (5)' and inserting in lieu thereof '(1), (2), or (5).'

"SEC. 27. Subsection (h) of section 201 of such act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(h) The corporation may make loans under this section at any time prior to January 23, 1934: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the corporation from issuing funds to a borrower prior to January 23, 1939, under the terms of any agreement with the borrower made prior to January 23, 1934.'

"SEC. 28. Section 201 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(k) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make available out of the funds of the corporation a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, which may be used by the corporation for the purpose of enabling and assisting established credit insurance organizations in the United States to provide export credit guaranties upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon between the corporation and such credit insurance organizations.'

"SEC. 29. Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 301 of such act is amended by striking out 'July 1, 1933' and inserting in lieu thereof 'January 1, 1934.'"

Amend the title so as to read:

"A bill to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in relieving the hardships and suffering caused by unemployment, to amend the emergency relief and construction act of 1932, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the two amendments will be considered together, the amendment of the title being a separate amendment.

Mr. WAGNER obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, before explaining in detail the amendment which I have offered to the pending measure, I should like to submit some observations upon the general situation which confronts us.

Mr. President, I sometimes wonder whether all of us have yet realized the extent and the depth of the present crisis in the lives of the people of the United States; whether we all know that in every large city large numbers of upstanding, sturdy, and splendid men and women are being destroyed by a poverty so grim that the like of it has never been seen in this country. In this day and age of plenty, hundreds and thousands of people in the congested areas of population are living on city refuse like the beasts of the jungle. Homeless, cheerless, hopeless, half starved, and cold, these American families are being crushed into the very earth.

I marvel at the general complacency in the presence of these facts. Can it be that in so short time we have come to accept such conditions as normal and proper? Are we blind to the demoralization which is in progress to the obliteration of all standards of living for a large portion of our population? Are we unaware that these inhuman conditions are placing the fate of America in jeopardy?

What is the situation with respect to relief? The known facts can be stated simply. The need for the relief of destitution is to-day greater than it has been at any time during the depression, and it is still growing. The rising curve of destitution is graphically illustrated in the chart which I have before me, prepared by the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor, and appearing in its January, 1933, relief bulletin. That chart, Mr. President, shows only the growth in the amount of money expended for relief; it does not reveal, and we have no means of knowing, the even greater spread of want, dependence, and destitution.

It is not difficult to see why the need for relief should be increasing. Basically, of course, the reason is that unemployment is still spreading.

In his testimony before the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee which held hearings upon my bill, Mr. Edward McGrady, representing the American Federation of Labor, expressed that fundamental fact effectively. He said:

> I might call your attention to the fact, Senator, that on the 1st of February you reached the all-time peak of unemployment. You have crossed the 12,000,000 line for the first time, and, as I understand it, that is more unemployed than we have records for in any other country of the world that keeps records, and it is getting worse. * * * In addition, * * * 9,000,000 more are now getting only part-time work.

The full significance of this startling figure is not understood unless it is considered in the light of the long duration of the depression. In the course of four cruel winters private resources have been exhausted, savings-bank accounts have been depleted to the extent of three and one-half billion dollars in a single year, life-insurance policies have been borrowed against to the limit, homes have been abandoned, private possessions sold. No wonder that the case load of relief agencies is to-day growing at a more rapid pace than unemployment itself. Examine the Red Cross figures. They tell a burning story of American tragedy which ought to leave no heart unmoved, no act undone to stop or, at least, to mitigate the ravages of the prevailing distress. According to the report of the Red Cross as of December 31, 1932, 4,750,000 separate families have applied for flour and almost as many for clothing.

It seems to me that on the basis of this evidence there is ample justification for the estimate made by one of the witnesses before the Banking and Currency Committee that "there are no less than 45,000,000 people living in poverty," of which "15,000,000 are existing only with the help of charity, without which they would perish."

These facts and figures offer a challenge to American leadership which has thus far not been met, and I say to those who have continuously resisted and checked every effort to meet it that if they persist they will endanger the very existence of the most cherished American institutions and inflict a blow from which the American people will not fully recover for generations to come.

We are not in a mere business recession We are not undergoing a so-called depression. We are in a life and death struggle with the forces of social and economic dissolution, and it is our responsibility to throw all the resources of our people and our Government into the fray on the side of humanity to prevent the disintegration which is in progress before our very eyes.

The most immediate objective and the most crucial is to provide adequate relief upon a standard of decency for all those who are in need of assistance. No one whose conscience has been penetrated by the prevailing scene of desolation questions that assertion.

How shall we provide the necessary relief? Private charity has reached the peak of its efforts and has begun to decline. A steadily increasing proportion of relief has come from governmental sources. Most of the States and municipalities have reached the limit of their capacity and are not likely to increase their commitments for relief, except by diverting sums from normal and essential functions.

If proof of these declarations is necessary, it is readily accessible. Mr. Ralph G. Hurlin testified before the Committee on Manufactures that the community-chest campaign in 150 communities succeeded in raising for 1933 only 77 per cent of the amount collected for 1932. When last we considered relief legislation it was commonly accepted that of the relief money then expended, 30 per cent came from private sources. The January bulletin of the Children's Bureau discloses that the ratio has changed. To-day only 12 per cent has its origin in private contributions, 88 per cent in public funds. There is no explanation for that shift except the obvious fact that whereas the need for relief has been expanding the capacity of private contributors has been declining.

Now we face the further fact that the resources of States and municipalities are no longer capable of meeting the enlarged need. We recognized that fact when Congress passed the emergency relief and construction act. It is far truer to-day. The situation was well summarized by Prof. Sumner Slichter, of Harvard, a very careful investigator. I quote him:

> But the ability of the cities (and the counties) to raise funds by taxation is shrinking, because about nine-tenths of their income is derived from the taxation of real estate which, even before the depression, was heavily overtaxed relative to other sources of income. Falling rents and a rising percentage of vacancies are steadily reducing the ability of real estate to bear the burden of relief. All this is reflected in the mounting tax delinquencies. Last year Detroit imposed a levy of $76,000,000, of which it failed to collect $18,000,000. Pittsburgh had a levy of $22,594,000, of which over $3,000,000 was delinquent. In Cleveland nearly 19 per cent of the county taxes are delinquent and about 50 per cent of the special-assessment taxes. Particularly important is the fact that ability to give relief has diminished most of all in precisely those communities where unemployment is greatest. For a few months relief may be financed by borrowing, but city after city has now reached the point where further borrowing is impossible.

There is but one conclusion that can possibly be drawn from the facts I have so briefly sketched, and that is that the Federal Government must assume a much larger and direct responsibility in meeting the relief and employment obligations of the current emergency.

Before I consider the provisions of the amendment I have presented to the Costigan-La Follette bill, I want to describe briefly what has been done since last July under the terms of the emergency relief and construction act which Congress passed during the closing hours of the last session.

Under title 1 of that act, making advances to the States for the relief of destitution, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has down to February 8, 1933, authorized advances of $167,000,000. All but nine States have taken advantage of its provisions. I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a table showing the amount of advances authorized for the several States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WAGNER. Under title 2 of the act providing for loans for the construction of self-liquidating projects the total authorizations to February 1, 1933, by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation amounted to $155,721,000. Only an insubstantial amount of that sum has actually been advanced.

At this point in my remarks I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD a memorandum prepared by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation showing the estimated number of men to be employed on self-liquidating projects as of January 31, 1933.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum referred to is as follows:

The estimated number of men to be employed on the self-liquidating projects authorized by the corporation as at the close of business, January 31, 1933, is as follows:

| | Man-years | Man-months | Man-days |
|---|---|---|---|
| Direct | 76,818 | 921,816 | 19,972,711 |
| Indirect | 70,853 | 850,236 | 17,004,720 |
| Total | 147,671 | 1,772,052 | 36,977,431 |

Total authorized, $155,721,634.24.

The above figures on direct employment are based on 1,560 working hours per man per year, or approximately 22 days per month at 6 hours per day. The figures on indirect employment, in accordance with the method used by the Bureau of Public Roads, are based on 1,920 working hours per man per year, or 20 days per month at 8 hours per day.

Figures on direct employment are the estimates furnished by the applicants. Although we have no direct check on these estimates, we have checked them against figures supplied by the Bureau of Public Roads and the Bureau of Labor Statistics covering average construction projects of similar type, and we feel that in some cases the applicants' figures have been overestimated.

As to indirect employment, we have worked out the figures in conjunction with the Bureau of Public Roads, which has made a thorough and careful study of the general subject in connection with their own work.

It should be understood that we do not vouch for the accuracy of the figures, but that they represent the best estimates available at the present time.

Mr. WAGNER. Under title 3 of that act, which appropriated $322,000,000 for Federal construction, the several departments of the Government up to December 1, 1932, had committed for expenditures $156,082,157.

Mr. President, I have received from the Bureau of Public Roads an estimate of the volume of employment directly provided by the emergency road appropriation carried in that act. It discloses that during the month of November 89,230 men, and in December 76,954 men, were given direct employment as a result of that emergency appropriation. In order to arrive at the total volume of employment directly and indirectly provided as a result of that appropriation, those figures should be respectively multiplied by three, for behind every man on the site of construction two men are engaged in the fabrication of materials, in transportation, and other indirect occupations directly set on foot as a result of the construction project. I ask leave that the two tables I have here may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

[6] November report.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, what has been done under the emergency relief and construction act is cruelly little, but let it be said now that it is the only emergency action taken which has directly contributed to the preservation of life and has kept at least some men at work in their normal occupations and has sustained their morale, their purchasing power, and their citizenship.

It seems to be beyond dispute that we shall not start a single force for recovery by pursuing a policy of slow national starvation and attrition until declining production overtakes vanishing consumption. That is the course of self-imposed poverty and deliberate national deterioration. In so far as recovery can be promoted by domestic efforts, it must have as its focus the expansion, not the contraction, of activity; the spread of purchasing power, not its further destruction. The only line of fruitful activity which will not serve to increase the very surplus of unsalable commodities is the construction of necessary projects which are in the public interest.

Beyond this central fact there are additional pertinent factors which deserve consideration and fortify the wisdom of pursuing that course. First, construction is the most severely deflated of American industries. The decline in wage payments in that industry has been in excess of 75 per cent as compared with 1929, and the volume of construction contracts awarded has shrunk from an average of $550,000,000 a month in 1928 to about $110,000,000 a month in 1932. Second, construction costs have fallen to so low a level that, in the interests of genuine economy and the saving of the taxpayers' money both now and in the future, it is desirable to prosecute every needful construction or reconstruction project at the present time. Third, the expansion of construction through Reconstruction Finance Corporation financing gives us the necessary means of releasing the right kind of inflation—credit inflation—through the creation of job-giving activities for the production of genuine wealth of permanent value. I have, as the Senate knows, long advocated the advance planning of public construction as a method of helping to stabilize employment. The policy of advance planning was, after much effort, written into the law in February, 1931.

I have before me a very interesting calculation prepared by the Director of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board which indicates that proper allocation of all public construction between 1925 and 1929 would have left almost $4,000,000,000 for construction activitity in 1931 and 1932. That would have been enough, practically, to take up the slack in that industry.

I ask that that table, with the attached explanation furnished by the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table and explanation are as follows:

The attached photostatic table represents annual (calendar year) estimates of construction expenditures by all agencies whose expenditures are ascertainable, as compiled by this board; 1932 data are still subject to some minor correction.

In my opinion, the grand total for 1930, 1931, and 1932 is about 80 per cent of all construction work performed in this country. The remaining 20 per cent is impossible to estimate in detail.

The chart Estimated Construction Expenditures with Advance Planning Possibilities was based on these estimates. The annual contraction of public works from 1925 through 1929, as shown on this chart, is purely arbitrary. The contraction and expansion by years, as shown on this chart, amount to:

Contraction

|---|---|
| 1925 | $570,000,000 |
| 1926 | 400,000,000 |
| 1927 | 970,000,000 |
| 1928 | 860,000,000 |
| 1929 | 1,030,000,000 |
| | 3,830,000,000 |

Expansion

|---|---|
| 1931 | 1,600,000,000 |
| 1932 | 2,230,000,000 |
| | 3,830,000,000 |

The expansion, totaling $3,830,000,000, was arbitrarily divided between 1931 and 1932, as indicated (1930 was not greatly below normal).

This display is based on "dollar" volume of construction. The cost of construction has declined about 10 per cent in 1930, 20 per cent in 1931, and 30 per cent in 1932 from the 1929 level. If the "dollar" volume could be translated into physical units, or employment, there would be a consequent increase in the years 1930–1932. The stars approximate what this level would have been in terms of physical units, or employment.

Very truly yours,

D. H. SAWYER, Director.

Compiled by the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, Dec. 21, 1932.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not believe there is any serious division of opinion respecting the proposal that every effort be made to open up employment opportunities through the initiation of necessary construction projects. That proposal is the policy we adopted in the emergency relief and construction act of 1932. The reasons for the meager performance under that measure are to be found both in the restrictive language of the act as now written, as well as in the ultraconservative policy pursued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was the common opinion expressed at the hearings before the subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee that the two chief obstacles to the initiation of job-giving projects under the emergency relief and construction act were, first, the rigorous definition of a self-liquidating project; and, second, the high interest rates required by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In both respects the bill which I present provides what I regard as the necessary remedy. So far as public construction by local governmental bodies is concerned, the requirement that a project be self-liquidating is entirely abandoned. In lieu of that requirement the bill would provide a new standard that any project initiated by a public body shall be eligible for a loan if it is needful and in the public interest. The rate of interest to be charged on construction loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is fixed at a rate not to exceed one-half per cent above the rate carried on the last issue of Federal bonds immediately preceding the making of the loan. These are the principal changes. They will, in my judgment, permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to function in the manner in which it was intended to function, namely, as an agency to promote recovery, to provide employment, and to stimulate business, industry, and agriculture.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire of the Senator from New York, as well as the Senator from Wisconsin, whether there is any provision in the bill sponsored by the Senator from Wisconsin and reported by the committee liberalizing the provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act in relation to so-called self-liquidating projects?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; of course, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry made by the Senator from Montana, let me say that there is nothing in the bill as reported from the Committee on Manufactures which deals with the section of the relief and reconstruction act concerning loans for self-liquidating works, but the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from New York to the bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures, embodies all the provisions of the so-called Wagner bill liberalizing loans for self-liquidating projects, and that is now the pending question.

Mr. WAGNER. Does that answer the question of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That answers the question, and I thank the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the other changes affected by my proposal are summarized in the committee report on Senate bill 5609.

These changes will render eligible many useful and necessary projects which are now denied loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. If these legislative changes are also accompanied by a change of heart in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the development in that organization of a vigorous will to effectuate the policy of Congress, we may with confidence anticipate an improvement in the employment situation.

My proposal carries no provision for the expansion of the program of Federal construction. The reason for that omission is not that I regard it as unnecessary; the reason is that I believe that we can more successfully formulate such a program under the auspices of the new administration.

Mr. President, as we consider the questions of depression and relief, as we fix our attention upon statistical tables showing the rise and fall of business, we sometimes forget the individual who has borne the brunt of the long economic struggle. Undoubtedly every portion of the population has suffered in the general deflation of values and shrinkage of income, but I submit that the heavy end of the load has been carried by the men and women who work on the farm and in the factory to earn their daily bread. And not only is that true but it is also a fact that during the days of prosperity they did not enjoy the same relative increase in earnings that was enjoyed by the investor. I have had prepared a table which reveals the relationship very clearly. The table is as follows:

| | Relative amount paid out in wages | Relative amount paid out in dividends |
|---|---|---|
| 1926 | 100 | 100 |
| 1927 | 97 | 108 |
| 1928 | 95 | 119 |
| 1929 | 100 | 140 |
| 1930 | 80 | 138 |
| 1931 | 60 | 104 |
| 1932 (December) | 38 | 59 |

It is about time that we turned our attention in the direction of the wage earner who did not enjoy, relatively, the benefits of prosperity and who is to-day the chief sufferer of the consequences of depression. Out of his labor we reared the industrial greatness of America. That greatness can not endure unless we restore him to gainful employment.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator from New York if he would object to including in his amendment at the appropriate place some such provision as this:

To make loans to corporations formed wholly for the purpose of providing housing for the families of officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps?

May I say a brief word in explanation of that suggestion?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield further.

Mr. TYDINGS. In Annapolis Md., there are a considerable number of Navy and Marine Corps officers. A corporation has been formed to build housing there for about 75 or 100 of these officers' families. The project has been approved, I am told, by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in so far as its financial feasibility is concerned. However, may I say to the Senator from New York that the original act did not authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans for that purpose; and the purpose is simply to have that power conferred on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation so that a housing proposition can be approved which will provide work, be self-liquidating in character, and furnish quarters for our Army, Navy, and Marine officers which the Government may have to build out of other funds if this is not done.

Mr. WAGNER. To the expansion of that particular section to the extent suggested by the Senator I do not object at all; but the Senator will have to draft an amendment, because in my proposed amendment I do not deal with the question of housing at all. I leave that as it is in the original act. I see no objection to that.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like at this time to have passed upon the question of inserting it at its appropriate place in the amendment of the Senator from New York, and I will have the amendment properly drafted so that it will fit into the bill. May I further say to the Senator from New York that when the original act was passed it was provided that we should make loans to corporations formed wholly for the purpose of providing housing for families of low income; and all that this amendment would do is to provide housing for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

Mr. WAGNER. I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York modify his amendment to that effect?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes. I understand the purpose of the amendment, and it is quite agreeable to me.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I notice that the Senator's proposal is limited to loans to States, municipalities, and so forth, and that he has also taken in private corporations. I do not see, anywhere in the amendment, any limit as to the amount that may be loaned.

Mr. WAGNER. To whom?

Mr. FESS. For these purposes.

Mr. WAGNER. To a corporation, to a public body, municipality, or State?

Mr. FESS. No; the sum total.

Mr. WAGNER. The sum total, to whom? To a municipality or to a private corporation?

Mr. FESS. Both.

Mr. WAGNER. There is a limitation in the act itself, which is not modified at all.

Mr. FESS. Oh, there is? My thought was that there ought to be some limit.

Mr. WAGNER. Oh, yes. That limitation in the original act is retained. I am not changing that limitation at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not had time to compare the amendment which the Senator is going to offer to the La Follette-Costigan bill with his original bill, S. 5609.

Mr. WAGNER. I know the matter in which the Senator is particularly interested. The question does not arise in the amendment which I have offered now, but it will arise in the next amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment which the Senator is offering now has no provision prohibiting the expenditure of any relief funds for administration?

Mr. WAGNER. No. The amendment which I offer now deals only with enlarging the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to States, municipalities, or other public bodies for projects which are needful and in the public interest.

Mr. BARKLEY. So-called self-liquidating projects. The Senator is not dealing with relief?

Mr. WAGNER. I am not dealing with relief just at this moment. That will come at a subsequent time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Senator going to offer his bill, Senate 5609, later as a substitute for the whole La Follette bill?

Mr. WAGNER. I propose to do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. While I am on the subject, let me ask the Senator whether he would accept an amendment which I propose to offer to that bill, eliminating the provision which prohibits the use of any of these funds for administration within the States?

Mr. WAGNER. I am not the author of that particular amendment. It was incorporated by the committee itself, so I do not feel authorized myself to accept the amendment. I personally shall make no objection to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. When the time comes I am going to offer that amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have examined the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and also listened to the Senator's explanation of it. It seems to me that there is no serious objection to the adoption of the amendment, as it is in the right direction, and I think has the possibilities of absorbing considerable unemployment.

Mr. WAGNER. I am very confident about that, Mr. President.

Mr. FESS. For that reason I feel like supporting it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement concerning the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

His amendment, if agreed to, will appear at the end of the committee amendment now pending. The amendment of the Senator from New York does not seek to deal with the question of direct unemployment relief for the aid of destitution. The pending amendment incorporates all of the provisions contained in the original bill of the Senator from New York designed to liberalize the terms of the existing act under which loans for public works may be extended.

Mr. President, with that purpose I am in hearty sympathy. While I did not agree with the proposal offered by the Senator from New York last spring, because I felt that the total of public works which he provided under that bill would prove to be inadequate, I tested out the issue, however, in the Senate by offering a substitute providing for a five and a half billion dollar public-works program, and it was defeated. In the closing hours of this session, with millions of persons hungry, destitute, and cold, I do not propose again to raise the issue concerning the size of the public-works program to be undertaken.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am very hopeful that the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from New York, will be agreed to.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Referring to the suggestion the Senator made as to the usefulness of a public-works program to absorb unemployment, I might state that I put into the RECORD to-day some very interesting figures which show that if we could secure $2,000,000,000 for public projects all through the country—there are many of them, easily $2,000,000,000 worth—we could put 2,000,000 men to work on those projects, and indirectly a great many more. I mean it would have a tremendous effect on these efforts we are making for economic rehabilitation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from New York and myself are not in disagreement concerning the advisability of employing a large public-works program for the purpose of providing reemployment and stimulating recovery. The only place where the Senator from New York and myself have had any difference of opinion has been in regard to the size of the program necessary to achieve the objectives which we both seek to attain. As I stated a moment ago, however, I do not propose, in the closing hours of this short session of Congress, to raise that issue again. I am in hearty sympathy with everything the Senator from New York has said concerning the too strict terms of the original act concerning loans for public works and the too conservative administration of it, and I hope that everything that he seeks to achieve will flow from a liberalization of the existing law.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I make one other observation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I would not want the RECORD to show that the Senator and I differ upon any of these efforts to secure the employment of the unemployed. We do not differ as to the size of the program. I think I am simply a little more pragmatic than the Senator, and I knew it was hopeless to secure the passage of any such large program as both of us realized was needed to attack this problem in a bold and courageous manner.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me continue this discussion for only a moment longer.

The timing and the size of a public-works program are the essence of it if we seek to employ it to stimulate a recovery, to check the downward trend of the vicious spirals always in evidence in a depression.

The Senator from New York advocated a smaller program than I. I did not advocate the larger program for any theoretical reasons or for any reasons of enthusiasm. I advocated the larger program because at the time I offered the five and one-half billion dollar public-works amendment last year I was convinced, after conference with the best experts I could find in the United States who knew anything about the theory, that even at that stage, relatively higher than the one upon which we now rest, a five and one-half billion dollar program was the minimum which could achieve the results which both the Senator from New York and myself sought to obtain. As I stated, however, I do not care to raise that issue. I do not care to discuss it. I simply made reference to it in order that there might not be any inconsistency in the record which I have attempted to make during the progress of this cataclysmic deflation and depression.

I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not quite understand the situation. Has the amendment of the Senator from New York been modified while I was out of the Chamber?

Mr. WAGNER. I might say to the Senator from Florida that the amendment I have offered is that portion of the bill considered by the subcommittee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator does not mind, I should like to have the amendment acted upon now. There does not seem to be any objection at all to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak on the amendment I am about to offer in the absence of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], with whom I held a conference a moment ago. In view, however, of the possible immediate adoption of the amendments of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], I wish to direct his attention to that portion of his amendments which relates to loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to private corporations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I say that I rose with the idea of submitting some remarks on this amendment. I was asked by the Senator from Colorado to yield in order that it might be agreed to, and I did so. If it is going to be discussed, I desire to be heard.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I was under the impression that the amendment was to be adopted instantly.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was my understanding.

Mr. COSTIGAN. At any moment he so desires I will yield with pleasure to the able Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was under the impression that the Senator from Florida was endeavoring to discuss another matter.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, my suggestion may be speedily determined. Directing the attention of the author of the amendments to page 2, line 21, we find that in the case of loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to private corporations, bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, canals, and markets are included, provided they are devoted to public use.

In our western more or less arid country we have mutual irrigation companies, the distributing properties of which are reasonably regarded as devoted to public use. These companies find it necessary to construct reservoirs as a highly important part of their irrigation systems.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has recently dealt with the question whether it is authorized to make loans to such corporations where the security is ample if reservoirs are included with the canals. In the cases I have in mind the reservoirs are decidedly important for the proper accumulation and storage of sufficient water for use in canals in those regions which are dependent on irrigation.

It is my understanding that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has decided that it may not consider reservoirs, however valuable for the successful operation of the canals, as subject to inclusion in security for loans upon canals devoted to a public use. I therefore ask the Senator from New York whether he is willing to incorporate in his amendments, following the word "canals," on page 2, line 22, an amendment reading in substance as follows: "reservoirs, reasonably essential to the operation of such canals"?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I see no objection to that. It still must be self-liquidating in character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is accepted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

THE FUTURE OF OUR FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I rose to submit some observations with reference particularly to section 24 of the amendment of the Senator from New York. The amendment has been agreed to, however, and is not involved just now; but with the Senate's permission, very briefly, I want to refer to a subject not directly one of relief but one which concerns the general conditions of the whole country.

We have many problems before us. This is a great country, and there are numerous problems to be settled. One of them, in my judgment, very important just now, is the building up, extension, and expansion of our export trade. The statement is made, and no doubt it is true, that the farm income of our country has shrunk from its peak of $17,000,000,000 in 1920 to $12,000,000,000 in 1929, and to an estimated $5,250,000,000 in 1932.

We have some very important exportable surpluses—for instance, cotton, wheat, tobacco, meat products, and that sort of thing. We have to dispose of those surpluses somewhere, somehow; and that, it seems to me, involves consideration of the question of attending to our foreign trade.

Mr. President, I had the privilege of offering as an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill when it was pending before the committee what became known as section 5A. It was agreed to in the Senate and became part of the law. But nothing has been done under it so far.

The purpose of that provision was to enable the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to finance the export of agricultural products particularly. In the foreign countries people are accustomed to buy on terms which are not usually considered banking terms. For instance, it is not business a bank would attend to. Thirty, sixty, and ninety day business does not count with them. They want a longer time. They want 4 or 6 or 8 or 10 months, and it is a safe business. It has to be handled in a different way from the ordinary commercial transaction.

We are trying to do something about our exportable surpluses by some sort of plan of inverted tariffs, but we have not gotten very far with that. In the Wagner amendment there is a provision, section 24, which provides for financing our agricultural products and agricultural raw materials furnished to manufacturers.

Mr. President, that is a general statement with reference to the importance of opening up markets abroad for the selling of our agricultural surplus products. In a general way I may say, on the subject of the importance of foreign trade in our international economic structure, that the question is, is it necessary for the United States, as a Nation, to concern itself with foreign commerce in view of the immensity of the problems presented by its purely domestic economic and commercial situation? With the total sales of American products abroad fallen to the lowest point since 1905, would it not be best to abandon entirely our efforts to expand our foreign trade or even to try to retain what we have left? Those who advocate this negative course—and, surprisingly enough, there are some otherwise thoughtful and intelligent men in the camp of the ultraisolationists—can not have given full consideration to all of its implications.

We in the United States might, perhaps, be a happier and more prosperous Nation were we sufficient unto ourselves alone, able to work out our own economic destiny without regard to other nations. But any such convenient isolation is a mere philosophical conception. Facing things as they are, we find that in spite of our tremendous natural resources and high state of industrial development, we are far from self-sufficient and far from any prospect of becoming so. Were we to cut off our imports from other nations, we should, to begin with, have to give up our coffee, tea, and cocoa, do without silk clothing or goods. These things, to be sure, might perhaps be classed as luxuries, although their distribution and sale in the United States is affording employment to thousands of Americans. But in our civilization to-day no one could class rubber and tin as luxuries. On these two raw materials alone depend some of our greatest industries. And every pound of tin and of rubber that goes into finished American manufactures must be bought abroad. Platinum, a metal that is an essential to the manufacture of many electrical products, is another mineral for which we must look entirely to foreign sources of supply.

Coffee, tea, cocoa, silk, rubber, tin, and platinum are merely a few of the items in the long list of commodities and materials in daily use that simply can not be produced in the United States. We may think of steel, for example, as an American product. Certainly, in the industrial uses of steel this country has shown the way to the rest of the world. But it is a matter of cold fact that modern steel and its alloys, essential as they are to the preservation of twentieth-century American civilization, can not be produced in the United States without the use of imported materials.

I do not think I need further stress America's dependence on imports. Even those who may be most contemptuous, in theory, of foreign trade as a factor of importance in our economic scheme must grant that agricultural and industrial self-sufficiency could not be attained without a willingness to revert to a standard of living lower than that of any nation that can possibly call itself civilized according to modern standards.

Now, the United States must, somehow, pay for the rubber, tin, steel, alloys, and the long list of other essential materials for which we are obliged to turn to foreign sources, whether we like it or not. If our foreign transactions were confined to purchases alone, we should find ourselves obliged to pay for them by shipments of gold. Even at the peak of domestic prosperity, such an arrangement would be altogether impossible. It becomes necessary, therefore, to sell our own goods abroad in order to create at least an approximate balance and to avoid a disproportionate drain upon our gold resources. In other words, we must export, if only in order to pay for our necessary imports.

It may seem that I am speaking in elementary terms, but I do wish to emphasize, just as strongly as I can, a simple and elementary fact—too often clouded in loose, theoretical discussion—that foreign trade always has been and must continue to be one of the essential, basic parts of the very foundation of the commercial and economic structure of the United States. There is no question as to whether or not we shall continue to trade with other nations; the only question is as to whether we shall recognize the vital importance of that trade to our national welfare and, where we can properly do so, foster and stimulate it to the best of our ability.

Our exports during the year 1932 dropped to a dismally low figure. Their total value was slightly more than $1,600,000,000. Yet can we call that negligible when we learn that the number of those employed in producing the goods we sold to other countries during the year is estimated at 2,000,000? It is further calculated, by the Secretary of Commerce, that in addition to these 2,000,000 workers, there were about 1,250,000 persons engaged in activities supplying the daily needs of those directly employed. These figures, I am informed, do not include the men and women engaged in the clerical and mercantile phases of the export business proper—in warehousing, ocean shipping, banking, insurance, and other related occupations.

A branch of activity which, even at the lowest ebb of a quarter of a century, gives jobs to upwards of three and one-quarter million Americans, in every section of the country, is very decidely a matter of national concern. Whatever the Federal Government can properly do to assist it is directly for the benefit of our people as a whole, not for any particular group interest. The broad range of activities that are affected by the sale of American goods in world markets may be indicated to some extent by citing the fact that last year, foreign countries purchased more than one-half of our entire cotton crop, 40 per cent of our leaf tobacco, 15 per cent of our wheat crop, 24 per cent of our lard production, 13 per cent of our lumber production, 11½ per cent of the automobiles we manufactured, and 30 per cent of our output of lubricating oils.

Mr. President, let us frankly face the fact that the volume of our exports during 1932 was far from satisfactory. But should we, therefore, as a nation, throw up our hands in despair and adopt a defeatist attitude of laissez-faire toward our foreign trade? Decidedly not! I believe that the enlightened foreign policies of the new administration will result in a direct and general stimulation of world commerce, in which we must be prepared to maintain our share. I am confident that the next few months will at least bring progress toward a clearing of the muddled situation created by the present uncertainty with respect to the war debts. This will prepare the way for genuinely constructive international cooperation at the forthcoming world monetary and economic conference. Before our world trade or that of any other nation can be restored to a healthy basis there must be a relaxation of the bonds of excessive tariffs, rigid import quotas, and exchange control restrictions that are now strangling the free movement of goods between nations. It is necessary that there be a real truce in the economic warfare that is now being carried on throughout the world. American cooperation will be essential, and it will be forthcoming.

But, in the meantime, with respect to world trade, we must face the situation as it is to-day, with the sale of American goods abroad attended by such handicaps as would be unheard of in normal times. It does not lessen our difficulties (though it may help us better to appreciate our position) to learn that other nations are as hard hit as we are. While, during the first nine months of 1932, the value of our export trade declined 35 per cent, as compared with the same period of the previous year, the exports of France dropped by 38 per cent; those of Germany by 39 per cent; Sweden, 42 per cent; Japan and Italy, 35 per cent; and the United Kingdom, by 33 per cent. In spite of all the barriers erected against American goods in foreign markets, the United States continues to lead the world in the value of its exports.

I have shown that foreign trade still is vital to us as a nation, notwithstanding the vast potentialities of our home market. It is proper, therefore, that the Federal Government should interest itself to a reasonable extent in its promotion, as the governments of other nations are interesting themselves in extending the foreign commerce of their own nationals.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD at the close of my remarks an extract from an article from the Washington Star of February 12, concerning the current trade promotive activities of foreign governments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. FLETCHER. To hold our own as an exporting Nation during these trying days and to take advantage of the lifting of foreign barriers against our goods in the days to come, when there has been time to permit of our receiving the benefits of Mr. Roosevelt's policies of enlightened and far-sighted international cooperation, we, as a Nation, have a duty toward American exporters. This obligation, as far as the Federal Government is concerned, is being amply fulfilled through the operation of our Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

That bureau's corps of commercial attachés and trade commissioners throughout the world has a record of achievement far out of proportion to the small number of its personnel and their cost to the Government. These men devote themselves exclusively to one great mission—the promotion of the interests of American business abroad. Even our largest industrial organizations, with the best possible facilities for conducting their foreign trade, are found among the firms that have called upon the Foreign Commerce Service to solve their problems. On the other hand, no American firm is too small to enlist the conscientious and devoted efforts of those representatives in introducing their goods into foreign markets.

The "little fellows" in the export world have always relied much upon this bureau of our Government. In the most prosperous times, they can not afford to maintain foreign representatives of their own, or even to send out occasional travelers to introduce their goods. But, it may be asked, is there any good reason why a Government agency should concern itself with promoting the export trade of these comparatively small and perhaps inexperienced producers and exporters of American goods?

Mr. President, the answer to this question is emphatically in the affirmative. Our total export trade, normally running into the billions of dollars is, as we have seen, a matter of very real concern to every man and woman in the United States. But that total is not a matter of million-dollar orders. It is rather the sum of a countless number of individual transactions, both large and small. The export sales of every one of the "little fellows" are an important and integral part of the total. The builder of a house realizes that it is not only the great ornamental pillars of the façade to which he must devote his attention. No; the pillars may be an important part of the structure, but still more essential is the proper laying of each one of the thousands of little bricks that comprise the walls.

The thousands of sales, seemingly insignificant in themselves, of the great variety of American products, that are making a place for themselves in the markets of the world, are the bricks that make the walls of our great export structure; and let me emphasize again that the value of that structure, in which the whole American people has a direct or indirect share, was well over a billion and one-half dollars, even during so disastrous a year as 1932.

No one who has investigated the results of the trade-promotion work of the foreign commerce service can fail to be impressed with its effectiveness. Lest, however, the question may occur to any of you as to whether these men are finding enough to do during these days of deflated world trade, I think it worth stating that their work has actually increased, even as business has declined. Nowadays every sale abroad represents a solution of intricate special problems, due to the complicated tariff and quota systems of foreign countries and the difficulty of obtaining payment on account of drastic restrictions on foreign exchange. Let me give just one case to illustrate this point:

A southern European country, with rigid exchange control in effect, adopted the practice of authorizing importing firms, in rotation, to purchase foreign exchange to be applied to partial payments on goods purchased from abroad. In practice there was found to be a strong temptation on the part of local firms to apply this exchange to new purchases, instead of remitting it in every case to the foreign exporters for whom it was intended. In order to prevent losses to American firms through this sort of evasion, our commercial attaché in that country, on his own initiative, arranged with the central banking authorities to be notified whenever a local firm was authorized to purchase exchange for the purpose of applying it against its outstanding account with an American company.

In every case the attaché, on receipt of this notification, informs both the debtor and creditor that the exchange has been allotted. Realizing that the American official is aware that he is in a position to make the remittance, the European firm does not find it so easy to apply the funds to other purposes. This is especially true when, if the funds are not properly forwarded in due time, it hears from its American creditor—thanks to the warning of the commercial attaché.

As a result of this activity on the part of one alert commerce representative, some 120 creditor firms in the United States have been informed of authorizations to their debtors for the purchase of exchange. The total value of the collections effected already through the commercial attaché's foresight has been more than $19,000, representing only initial installments. He is continuing the practice as exchange is allotted for the payment of subsequent installments.

This is one example out of hundreds that might be selected of special services, to meet special conditions, performed by the bureau's foreign representatives. Their work, however, is not confined to cooperating in this less agreeable phase of foreign trading. They are still engaged very directly in obtaining actual new business for American companies. I may mention an order for $1,000,000 worth of a chemical product obtained recently by an American firm which has enthusiastically gone on record to the effect that the business was made possible only through the assistance of this Federal bureau and its foreign representatives; a sale of $500,000 worth of American aircraft; orders abroad for $3,000,000 worth of American fruit; a $500,000 foreign connection for an American tobacco exporter.

The Foreign Commerce Service is effective. If anyone questions that, he need not turn to me for testimony; let him rather consult the export interests of the United States. When the House committee was considering this bureau's appropriation there appeared before it a delegation representing the whole community of American business concerned with foreign trade. This group urged consideration of its—

> Unanimous opinion that further reduction (in the appropriation) would effect no savings whatever to the American people, but would definitely hamper such efforts to promote trade recovery as we feel this bureau is and has been making in tangible and practical ways generally known and accepted by the community of American exporters.

Let me quote further from a statement embodying the sentiments of American export interests, inserted in the record by the president of the National Foreign Trade Council:

> The foreign trade promotive service of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is an example, probably unique, of the development of a governmental agency at the direct instance of those that it was designed to serve. Its present organization represents the application of the ideas of American business itself, not the theories of Government officials as to what it ought to do for the export trader. Thus its activities are all directed along practical lines and represent work that could not be performed as well by any other agency, public or private.

Mr. President, no governmental activity could be further removed from the considerations of party politics than is the work of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Yet, as a Democrat, I can not help but take pride that the foreign trade promotive work of the bureau had its inception under an able Democratic Secretary of Commerce, William C. Redfield, during the first administration of President Wilson. In 1914 Secretary Redfield recommended in his annual report that a commercial attaché service, under the direction of the Department of Commerce, be established. Congress established funds for the new service in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1914–15.

It was under Secretary Redfield, too, that the district office service of the bureau was created—that admirable system providing for points of contact in commercial centers throughout the United States between business men and the bureau. Since then the staff of the bureau has been increased to meet the growing demands of business itself for the new service. But the basic organization remains in the form in which it was conceived by Mr. Redfield—specialists operating abroad to stimulate the purchase of American goods and to provide current up-to-the-minute reports for the benefit of American exporters, the Washington organization as a clearing house, and to complete the circut, the district offices ready to give immediate counsel to the business men of their communities, based on the reports from abroad and the data centralized in the divisions of the Commerce Department in Washington.

Throughout its growth the Foreign Commerce Service has been closely responsive to the requirements of business. Its establishment and subsequent development were in no sense in competition with the commercial activities of the Consular Service of the Department of State. For more than 100 years American consuls were charged, as a part of their many duties, with the promotion of American foreign trade. They made a conscientious effort to perform the service that was desired of them, and succeeded under the circumstances better than might have been expected.

But in recent years our exporters' demands for information on foreign markets and for actual assistance in selling goods abroad have increased so rapidly that a corps of commercial specialists in trading centers abroad had to be created to meet the new needs of American business.

The consular officers were not crowded out of any commercial work; there was, and there still is, more than enough to go around. In fact, under the guidance of commercial attachés and trade commissioners in the strategic cities of the world, consular reporting and promotive activity has shown marked improvement in quality. Our consular officers are charged with more than a dozen major functions, quite unrelated to commercial work. Experience has shown that they actually welcome the cooperation, in the field, of representatives of that department to which, as provided by law, their own commercial reports are submitted.

Mr. President, I am aware that there is an impression in certain quarters that the work of the Foreign Commerce Service duplicates certain activities of the Consular Service. If that were true, the facts should be known to the Secretary of Commerce, and certainly would be to the Secretary of State. It was with this in mind that the late Senator Jones, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, addressed an inquiry on April 1, 1932, to the heads of both departments, asking specifically whether such duplication existed.

Mr. Robert P. Lamont, at that time Secretary of Commerce, replied on April 7 that—

There is no longer any essential duplication in the functions of the two services.

Secretary Stimson wrote to Senator Jones on the same date that—

The activities of consular officers are complementary to those of the commercial attachés and trade commissioners of the Department of Commerce. In its general policy—the Department of State is guided by the wishes of the Department of Commerce as to the type of information desired in trade-promotion work * * *.

In that same communication, the Secretary of State mentioned a recently concluded coordination agreement between the two departments which, he stated—effectively disposes of any question of duplication between the two departments.

The coordination agreement, to which the Secretary referred, recognizes the principle that—the commercial attaché, acting under the instructions of the Secretary of Commerce, will obviously be in a position to indicate the needs of his department for trade promotional information, and he will accordingly give such guidance and assistance to the supervising consul general as may be required in order to obtain the best results in the most efficient and economical manner.

Under this plan, the American exporter now has the benefit of the closest and most efficient cooperation between the representatives of both departments abroad.

Mr. President, if a member of one's family lies gravely ill, and one calls in a specialist to supplement the efforts of the family physician, we do not accuse the specialist of duplicating the functions of the general practitioner, nor do we charge him with usurping the functions of another. The two physicians work together harmoniously, the qualifications of one supplementing those of the other. Let us think of the consul as the family physician, ready to protect American interests in a thousand ways, in whichever quarter they may be threatened. But let us grant, too, that in the complicated problems of American foreign trade to-day, the consul himself has need of the guidance and cooperation of the specialist, the trained foreign representative of the United States Department of Commerce.

EXHIBIT A

[From the Washington Star, February 12, 1933]

NATIONS NOW MOVING TO TAKE AMERICAN TRADE

By Harden Colfax

Reports coming to the Government from its commercial representatives abroad make it evident that the principal commercial nations of the Old World are now redoubling their efforts to secure foreign trade. They are, apparently, beginning to believe that the time is ripe to capture markets formerly served by Americans, because the American business man no longer concerns himself very much over trade with the world outside his own country.

Old World newspapers have been impressed by laments on this side over the decline in American foreign trade, our preoccupation with domestic business troubles, our efforts to check the flood of imports from countries with depreciated currencies, reduction in appropriations, and rumors that the incoming administration contemplates abolishing the commercial attaché service of the United States.

Most of the commercial nations have intensified their efforts during the past few months, not only to develop existing sales opportunities but to cooperate extensively with their own business men in long-range export campaigns. American commercial attachés, trade commissioners, and consuls abroad are reporting to Washington on these campaigns.

They tell, for instance, of the ambitious campaign of the Netherlands Bureau of Commerce and Industry, which the Government at The Hague has just authorized to double its allotment for salary and to increase its personnel by more than 30 per cent. It is also authorized to extend its commercial attaché service all over the world. Germany has begun to grant cheap credit facilities and to guarantee exports, particularly to Russia.

The Government of Canada is having considerable success in its newspaper advertising campaign to interest Canadian firms in foreign sales. Reporting that quite a number of firms in the Dominion have already developed an "export consciousness," the department of trade and commerce is spending considerable sums on newspaper, poster, and train and steamboat advertising to preach the desirability of shipping goods abroad. One of these announcements declares that the supreme duty of every producer and every business man in Canada is to "export as much as possible whenever and wherever possible." Canada now has 34 trade commissioners in the world's greatest business centers. It is proposed to increase this number.

The United Kingdom, which already spends five times as much per capita for the promotion of foreign trade as does the United States, has reduced its appropriation for foreign-trade promotion by less than 1 per cent. The Parliament of Australia is planning to create a permanent foreign trade promoting agency. Patterned after the foreign service of our own Department of Commerce, it would have cooperating offices in the capitals of the different states of the commonwealth. The plan includes also the appointment of prominent official Australian trade commissioners to China, Japan, the Netherland East Indies, British Malaya, and the Philippines.

Italy is reported to be committed to a policy of foreign-trade promotion and the trade press is "clamoring for increased appropriations for this purpose." Japan is pushing her governmental machinery and, although the details are not yet known, it is understood that the Government at Tokyo, in order to take full advantage of the present favorable position of Japanese wares because of the fall of the yen, proposes the appointment of a number of new trade commissioners all over the world.

France is contemplating opening additional foreign trade promotion offices—one in the United States, at Chicago; another in China, at Nanking; and another at Singapore. Spain, which now maintains 20 foreign offices, will double that number shortly. Brazil maintains seven commercial attachés abroad and will soon appoint four others. Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Denmark, Mexico, and Chile all have increased or will increase their appropriations for foreign trade promotion.

FEDERAL AID FOR UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

Mr. BANKHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARBOUR in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute is open to amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and ask that it may be pending.

Mr. WAGNER's amendment was, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That subsection (a) of section 1 of the emergency relief and construction act of 1932 is hereby amended by striking out "$300,000,000" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$600,000,000."

SEC. 2. (a) The first sentence of subsection (b) of section 1 of such act is amended by inserting before the words "Puerto Rico" the words "the District of Columbia,".

(b) The last sentence of subsection (b) of section 1 of such act is amended to read as follows: "before any amount is paid under this section to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or to the Governor of Puerto Rico or of the Territory of Alaska, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, or the Territory of Alaska shall enter into an agreement with the corporation for the repayment of such amount with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon."

SEC. 3. (a) The first sentence of subsection (c) of section 1 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"The governor of any State or Territory may from time to time make application for funds under this section, and in each application so made shall certify the necessity for such funds to supplement the relief resources of the State or Territory, the steps taken by the State or Territory, its political subdivisions, and private agencies, to meet the relief needs of the State or Territory, and the purposes for which the funds requested upon this section will be used."

(b) Subsection (c) of section 1 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "No part of the amounts paid to the governor of a State or Territory under this section shall be used for the payment of administrative expenses incurred in furnishing relief and work relief under this section."

SEC. 4. Subsection (f) of section 1 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(f) As used in this section the term 'Territory' means Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia; and the term 'governor' shall include the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

SEC. 5. Section 1 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) For the purposes of this act, the provisions of section 13 of the act entitled 'An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia,' approved June 11, 1878 (D. C. Code, title 20, ch. 4, sec. 622) (relating to increasing the indebtedness of the District of Columbia), are hereby declared inoperative."

SEC. 6. Such act is further amended by adding after section 1 thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 2. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make available out of funds of the corporation the sum of $15,000,000, under the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth, to the several States and Territories, to be used in furnishing relief and work relief to unemployed and needy transients, and to aid in their rehabilitation in training and work camps, or otherwise. Such sum shall be available for payment to the several States and Territories for the purposes of this section, upon application therefor by them through their governors (or, in the case of the District of Columbia, through the Commissioners of the District of Columbia) or such public relief agencies as the legislatures thereof (or, in the case of the District of Columbia, the Congress) may designate, and upon approval of such applications as hereinafter provided.

"(b) Any State or Territory which desires to receive funds under this section shall set forth in its application the need for such funds, the plan by which it proposes to administer such funds for the relief and rehabilitation of transients, and such other information with respect to its transient problems as the corporation may by regulation prescribe. Upon approval by the corporation of any such application in whole or in part, it shall make an estimate of the amount needed by the applicant for the purposes of this section for a reasonable period in advance. The amount so estimated shall be immediately paid by the corporation to the proper State or Territorial officials. Each amount so paid shall be considered as an outright grant to the State or Territory receiving the same, but the officials of the State or Territory who administer the amounts received under this section shall file with the corporation a statement of the disbursements made by them for the purposes of this section.

"(c) As used in this section the term 'Territory' means Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia."

SEC. 7. Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 201 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(1) To make loans to, or contracts with, States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of States, public agencies of States, of municipalities, and of political subdivisions of States, public corporations, boards and commissions, and public municipal instrumentalities of one or more States, to aid in financing the construction, reconstruction, replacement, extension, or improvement of projects authorized under Federal, State, or municipal law which, in the opinion of the corporation, are needful and in the public interest, such loans or contracts to be made through the purchase of their securities, or otherwise, and for such purpose the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to bid for such securities: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph, from purchasing securities having a maturity of more than 10 years;"

SEC. —. Paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of section 201 of such act is amended by inserting immediately before the semicolon a comma and the following: "and to make loans to finance the construction of housing projects for families of officers of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, which are self-liquidating in character."

SEC. 8. Paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of section 201 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(3) To make loans to private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction, replacement, or improvement of aircraft suitable for overseas transport and port facilities essential thereto, bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, canals, reservoirs reasonably essential to the operation of such canals, and markets, devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character, and to make loans to private corporations formed wholly for the purpose of developing cooperative community farming and crop marketing to aid in financing projects undertaken by such corporations which are self-liquidating in character;"

SEC. 9. Subsection (a) of section 201 of such act is further amended by striking out "(other than by taxation)."

SEC. 10. Subsections (c) and (d) of section 201 of such act are amended to read as follows:

"(c) In order that the surpluses of agricultural commodities and livestock (including products manufactured directly therefrom) may not have a depressing effect upon current prices of such commodities and products, the corporation is authorized and directed to make loans, in such amounts as may in its judgment be necessary, for the purpose of financing sales of such surpluses in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce; but no such sales shall be financed by the corporation if, in its judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such commodities and products: Provided, however, That no such loan shall be made to finance the sale in the markets of foreign countries of cotton owned by the Federal Farm Board or the Cotton Stabilization Corporation.

"(d) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans to bona fide institutions, organized under the laws of any State or of the United States and having resources adequate for their undertakings, for the purpose of enabling them to finance the carrying and orderly marketing of agricultural commodities and livestock produced in the United States, and the products manufactured directly therefrom."

SEC. 11. Subsection (f) of section 201 of such act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following: "but in determining the adequacy of security offered by a borrower applying under subsection (a) of this section the board may, in its discretion, accept as adequate security under this section, a lien on, or other satisfactory assurances of the application of, so much of the revenues from the project as may be required to meet interest payments during the period of the loan and assure refunding within a reasonable period: Provided further, That each loan made under paragraphs (1) to (5) of subsection (a) of this section after this subsection, as amended, takes effect, shall bear interest at a rate not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent more than the rate of interest established for the last issue of bonds of the United States preceding the making of such loan."

SEC. 12. The second proviso of subsection (g) of section 201 of such act is amended by striking out "(1) or (5)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(1), (2), or (5)."

SEC. 13. Subsection (h) of section 201 of such act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(h) The corporation may make loans under this section at any time prior to January 23, 1934: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the corporation from issuing funds to a borrower prior to January 23, 1939, under the terms of any agreement with the borrower made prior to January 23, 1934."

SEC. 14. Section 201 of such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(k) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make available out of the funds of the corporation a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, which may be used by the corporation for the purpose of enabling and assisting established credit insurance organizations in the United States to provide export credit guaranties upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon between the corporation and such credit insurance organizations."

SEC. 15. Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 301 of such act is amended by striking out "July 1, 1933" and inserting in lieu thereof "January 1, 1934."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend the emergency relief and construction act of 1932."

Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original amendment is first open to amendment. Has the Senator from Alabama an amendment that he desires to offer to the committee amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will send it to the desk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is on the desk.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment as amended is open to amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. The first amendment of the Senator from New York has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from New York has now offered a substitute for the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has offered a substitute for the committee amendment as amended, but before that may be voted upon the amendment of the committee itself as amended is open to further amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I submitted the amendment yesterday. It has been printed and is on the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offers an amendment proposing to strike out section 2 and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be engraved and printed currency of the United States in the form of stamped money certificates. Said certificates shall be in the denomination of $1 each, and the issue shall be limited to $1,000,000,000. Said certificates shall be of a suitable size to provide space on the backs thereof for affixing 52 postage stamps. The backs of said certificates shall be prepared in such manner as to indicate clearly the proper place for affixing each stamp contemplated herein, to the end that on the second Wednesday after the issuance of said certificates from the Treasury the first stamp shall be affixed, and thereafter on each Wednesday until a total of 52 stamps shall be affixed; and said certificates in the spaces designated for affixing said stamps shall set forth the day of the month and year when each such stamp shall be affixed, as for example:

"On April 5, 1933, affix 2-cent stamp here."

The face of said certificates shall set forth substantially the following:

"This certificate is legal tender for $1 for payment of all debts and dues, public and private, customs, duties, and taxes: Provided, That on the date of its transfer there shall be affixed 2-cent postage stamps for all dates prior to such date of transfer, as set forth in the schedule on the back hereof. When fifty-two 2-cent postage stamps shall have been affixed this certificate shall be redeemable at any post office for $1 lawful money of the United States."

(a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to issue the certificates directed to be issued hereunder in monthly or semimonthly installments, all of like tenor and effect except that the schedule for the affixing of the stamps on the back of said certificate shall bear dates for the affixing of stamps appropriate to the date of the issue of each such installment of certificates.

(b) When such certificates appropriately stamped in full shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption he shall certify to the Postmaster General from time to time the amount of certificates so presented for redemption, and the Postmaster General shall thereupon pay to the Secretary of the Treasury out of the funds arising from the sale of stamps the sum of one dollar for each such certificate so redeemed, whereupon said certificates shall be destroyed.

(c) Prior to the issuance of the first installment of certificates hereunder the Secretary of the Treasury is directed, by posters to be hung in post offices and other public places, and by advertising in newspapers and magazines, to advise the public of the contemplated issue of these certificates, with appropriate directions to the public with reference to the affixing of stamps, the legal tender quality of the certificates, their redemption feature, and all such similar information. There is hereby appropriated for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury to defray the cost of such advertising the sum of $100,000.

(d) When such certificates shall have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury the person holding the same on and after 12.01 o'clock antemeridian of the first Wednesday set forth in the schedule on the back of said certificates, shall affix in the space therein provided a 2-cent postage stamp of the United States. Prior to such time said certificates in the hands of all holders shall be legal tender for the payment of all debts for the sum of $1. After affixing the first stamp said certificate shall be legal tender as aforesaid for the payment of all debts until the following Wednesday when another 2-cent postage stamp of the United States shall be affixed by the person holding the same prior to 12.01 o'clock antemeridian of such Wednesday, and thereafter for 50 consecutive additional Wednesdays like postage stamps shall be affixed by the holders. At all times when there shall be affixed all such postage stamps as are required to be affixed on the back of such certificates prior to the date of transfer, such certificates shall be legal tender as aforesaid for the sum of $1. When fifty-two 2-cent stamps shall have been affixed on the back thereof the holder may present the same to any post office in the United States for redemption, and the same shall be redeemed by such post office in any present lawful money of the United States. All post offices in the United States are hereby charged with the duty of making such redemption and of forwarding such certificates for cancellation to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(e) With respect to such certificates as shall become unfit, through use, for further circulation, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General are authorized and directed to provide for the exchange of such worn-out certificates for new certificates, and to make all regulations required for that purpose.

(f) It is declared to be against the public policy of the United States to provide in any contract executed subsequent to the date of this act that the certificates to be issued under this act, or any like issue, shall not be received in the discharge of such contract, and all such provisions in such contracts are hereby declared null and void.

(g) Said certificates, when accepted by the Government, shall be promptly reissued by any department or agency of the Government receiving the same.

(h) In transactions of less than $1 such certificates are not legal tender unless stamped by the person tendering the same for one additional week after tender.

(i) Banks of deposit receiving such certificates as deposits may charge 2 cents for each certificate so deposited as a service charge.

(j) The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General are authorized to promulgate regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

(k) If and when the wholesale commodity price level of all commodities, included by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in computing index numbers of wholesale prices, shall equal 80 per cent of the average index number for the year 1926, then, anything to the contrary herein notwithstanding, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to discontinue the issuance of certificates hereunder, and such certificates as are then outstanding shall be retired as the same are presented for redemption or replacement of worn-out certificates.

(l) Five hundred million dollars of the amount made available under section 2 of this act shall be apportioned among the States on the basis of population according to the fifteenth decennial census. This amount is made available as herein provided in addition to the amount made available to the States under section 4 (a) of this act. The amount so apportioned to the States shall be delivered to the governor of the State applying for the apportionment made to his State, upon application being made therefor by the governor. The amount apportioned to a State shall be administered within the State under rules and regulations adopted by the governor thereof and through such agencies as he may establish. The amount apportioned to a State may be by the governor thereof apportioned to the counties, and/or to the municipalities of said State, and may be used in construction work or for emergency relief as defined in section 11 of this act.

On page 14, line 6, after the word "act," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "except as herein otherwise provided."

On page 15, line 21, strike out "forty," and insert in lieu thereof "twenty."

On page 16, line 8, strike out the words "The balance of the amount made available under section 2 (a) of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Thirty per cent of the amount made available under section 2 of this act."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Bible says, "The love of money is the root of all evil." I think that statement may safely be paraphrased at this time by saying that a lack of money is the cause of most of our present troubles. We hear at all times nowadays discussion of the money question. We know the very great and difficult problems that are confronting our country, growing out of our situation with reference to money. Bank credits since 1929 have contracted in the neighborhood of $13,000,000,000, and are daily growing smaller and smaller. Nearly every day information comes to us about the condition of banks in the various sections of the country. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to make any statement here that will tend in any way to aggravate the situation or to increase the state of alarm that so widely exists throughout the country, but we do know, without going into detail, the money condition in this country.

We have now a theoretical circulation of as much as or more money outstanding from the Treasury than we had in 1929; but Mr. President, we are confronted with the unfortunate situation that $300,000,000 of that circulation, as estimated by the Federal Reserve Board, is in foreign countries; that $100,000,000 of it has been lost; and that more than $2,000,000,000, in my opinion, is being hoarded; so that we are really without a sufficient circulating medium in actual use.

So far as the hoarded money is concerned, it might as well be idle in the vaults of the Treasury and not be outstanding. We not only have the tremendous contraction of bank deposits, as has been indicated, but a large proportion of the deposits of the banks are also hoarded, hoarded by the banks themselves as well as by the holders of savings certificates and by even the holders of checking deposits. So there is not in actual use a sufficient quantity of money to conduct the business of the country, and, as a result of the constantly shrinking volume of currency in actual use, our banks are getting weaker and weaker every day; the prices of commodities continue to fall, and business is being further contracted.

We hear talk all around about the necessity of some form of inflation. We shall have to come to that question and deal with it sooner or later, Mr. President. We shall either have to take some positive, affirmative action on that subject, or decide that we will go through the painful, distressing, heart-breaking process of complete liquidation in this country.

If we are going to liquidate, why not let liquidation go on now and take its regular course? If we are going to let the farmers lose their farms, if we are going to let the town people lose their homes, if we are going to let bank after bank continue to fail, if liquidation is to be the ultimate result, why not abolish the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? Why not quit pouring money into various institutions like pouring water into a rat hole? Why further involve the credit of the Nation and further burden the taxpayers of this country if it is merely to be used as a braking process to let the liquidation take place slower and slower?

Mr. President, if there is to be liquidation, I want to point out to the gentlemen who are coming here and telling us to balance the Budget and to save the gold standard—and I favor both if it is possible to do so—that if liquidation goes to its ultimate end, not only will the farmers and the small business men in this country be liquidated, but inevitably the cities, the States, the counties, and the Government itself will be liquidated; and the time will come when it will be impossible to collect enough taxes from the taxpayers of this country, after having lost their property, to pay the interest or the sinking fund upon the bonds of our cities, counties, States, and the United States.

That is exactly what we are heading for, unless, through some intervention, through some plan or measure which might be devised by Congress or by some international action, there comes about a restoration of business, an increase in commodity prices, a renewal of the employment of those now upon the unemployed list.

I am wondering if the Senate and the Congress are without sufficient vision, without sufficient courage, without sufficient boldness and daring, to intervene and take some action that will give the people of this country at least new hope. They are patient. Nobody can complain of the attitude of the American people under prevailing conditions, but they are waiting upon this Congress, Mr. President; and let me point out that in all great stirrings of the hearts and the souls of a people some leader, somewhere, somehow, has risen up to lead that feeling and to bring about action in accordance with a concerted and combined will of action by the people.

We, of course, are now, and millions of people in this country are to-day, looking forward with confidence to the leadership of Governor Roosevelt when he goes into the presidential chair. They are hopeful that under his leadership something will be done to stay these economic forces that are bearing down with unbearable weight upon the backs of the people of America.

Mr. President, in collaboration with Congressman PETTENGILL, of Indiana, I have put in form and offered here as an amendment the plan sponsored by Prof. Irving Fisher for the issuance of stamped scrip money. The standing of Professor Fisher as an economist is well known throughout this country. He has given to this subject very great thought, and he looks upon the measure as the most hopeful one that is available for temporary relief, for bringing about a revival in business, and as involving less evil consequences than any other plan that has been proposed.

Under this amendment which is offered, in the first place, provision is made for the issuance of $1,000,000,000 of $1 bills in the form of stamped money or stamped scrip, to be used in the way of relief as provided in the Costigan-La Follette bill. It is proposed to substitute this $1,000,000,000 of stamped money in lieu of the $500,000,000 which this bill provides for taking out of the Federal Treasury. It will therefore appear that with the substitution of this plan, in the first place, there is no drain upon the Federal Treasury in the matter of providing the much-needed emergency unemployment relief.

Instead of its tending in any way to unbalance the Budget by reason of this appropriation, it operates to create a profit for the Treasury of around $40,000,000.

In the second place, let me say to those who so ardently worship the gold standard, those who shake either with anger or with some other form of emotion whenever anything is suggested or proposed that may in the slightest way imperil the gold standard, that the money proposed to be issued under this plan calls for no gold coverage, is not redeemable in gold, has no bearing upon the gold standard, and in no way imperils that system of money which is so vigorously defended, whenever any suggestion is made that imperils it, by those who believe in that gold formula as some of us do in the Bible.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARBOUR in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. If I understand the Senator's proposal, the application of 2-cent stamps on this sort of money constitutes a sort of inverted sales tax, does it not? That is, the holders apply 2-cent stamps on it. Anyone that has to do with the handling of this money, when he passes a dollar bill, places a 2-cent stamp on it; and, as I have already said, it is a sort of inverted sales tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the amendment which the Senator proposes been considered by any standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has not. I will say to the Senator with perfect frankness that I have no illusions about the disposition to be made of this amendment. I know how reluctant this body is—and it may be right; I am not saying that in a critical way—to embark upon any plan of government, especially as it applies to our currency system, which is not approved by the bankers of the country. I know the resistance that any proposal encounters in this body when reference is made to a system that the bankers of this country claim they have the right to control. But let me proceed, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he proceeds?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator, of course, is aware of the fact that what he is now saying is blasphemy to the worshipers of the golden calf.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. I think the Senator realizes that from the way I have talked.

It is not my purpose to assail the gold standard. I hope it may be maintained. I hope that consistently with humanity it may be maintained; but, Mr. President, I am more concerned in saving our social fabric. I am more concerned in saving our representative form of government. I am more concerned in preserving respect for the law and obedience to the law. I am more concerned in avoiding resistance by force to our Government than I am in maintaining a standard which, since it first was used, has acted like a drunken man. It has staggered, it has stumbled, it has fallen from time to time, and has proven itself to be, instead of a measure of value, nothing but a value of weight.

But, passing that, the gold standard is not involved here. This provision requires, as brought out by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], that a 2-cent stamp shall be placed upon a dollar bill every Wednesday for 52 consecutive weeks. The certificate is made by this measure a legal tender for the payment of all public and private debts, taxes, collections, customs, and dues. There is no question, under that provision, about the money moving in circulation. The tax placed upon it—the stamp required to be put upon it—is a tax upon hoarding. The money will not go into the banks to stay there, as money is going now, where depositors have sufficient confidence in the banks. It will not go into the safety-deposit boxes and socks and other hiding places, where more than $2,000,000,000 has gone, and more is going every day.

The requirement for the placing of a 2-cent stamp every week upon that dollar as a tax guarantees that the dollar will move, when it comes into anyone's hands, before the following Wednesday. It is not a drain upon the Treasury, as I have indicated. It is self-liquidating money. It does not cost the taxpayer anything to redeem it. It does not ask for gold back of it to sustain it. When the 52 stamps are placed on the dollar the Government has in its possession, through the sale of those postage stamps, $1.04 in money with which to redeem the $1 bill.

Mr. President, I have heard the statement made frequently that the trouble is not the lack of a sufficient circulating currency. I have dealt with that from one standpoint. It is said that the trouble is a lack of velocity in circulation of the currency, and that is true. Nobody doubts that there is a paralysis in the matter of circulation. The velocity has almost disappeared. It is contended that that lack of velocity in the circulation of money is the main trouble. Then I point out to those interested in the subject that if that is the sore spot in our present currency system here is a plan which would absolutely remove and eliminate that objection and that difficulty.

I am proposing the issuance of money which, when it gets into circulation, amounting to a billion dollars, will turn over two or three times every week, and pass from hand to hand in the purchase of goods, in the payment of debts, in the payment of taxes, in the payment of pay rolls, in the payment for public works as it gets out in the beginning, so that it may turn over five or more times a week, and if it turns over only three times a week, that means $3,000,000,000 a week.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. With pleasure.

Mr. REYNOLDS. As I understand the matter, the Senator proposes to have the Government issue a billion dollars?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. And that means 1,000,000,000 dollar certificates?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; $1 bills.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Let us suppose that I am indebted to John Jones in the sum of $500, and am anxious to make liquidation of that amount. I believe that under the Senator's plan I go to the post office and secure there 500 different money certificates, for which I pay $10, by way of making purchase of five hundred 2-cent stamps, and then I place one of those 2-cent stamps upon each of the 500 certificates. Is that true?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct, so far as the stamps are concerned.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Then with the 500 money certificates in my hand, I proceed immediately to the home of John Jones, to whom I am indebted in the sum of $500, and I then and there lay down these 500 certificates. How are we to compel John Jones to accept, as payment of a $500 debt, that which I have purchased for only $10?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator will not have gotten it for $10.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I paid 2 cents for each of the stamps.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the Senator paid to get the money, besides the stamps.

Mr. REYNOLDS. What, in addition?

Mr. BANKHEAD. How did the Senator get the money?

Mr. REYNOLDS. As I understand it, under the Senator's measure I secure these money certificates at the post office.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. That is where the Senator is in error.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to have the Senator advise me.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The plan contemplates the use of half of this money and its distribution, I will say, under the relief plans provided in the Costigan-La Follette bill for emergency unemployment relief, for giving employment in any form of public works that are available, in the purchase of goods, food, clothing, and other necessary supplies. In other words, half of it is to go out in distribution through exactly the same channels, for exactly the same purposes, through exactly the same agencies, as provided in the Costigan-La Follette bill for the distribution of the $500,000,000 provided in that measure.

The other half is to be made available to the governors of the respective States on the basis of population, the allotment of a State to be turned over to the governor upon his application for use by him, either by allotment to counties or municipalities for public works construction, such as roads, sewerage, and matters of that kind, or for distribution otherwise as provided in the Costigan-La Follette bill; the object all the way through being, of course, that the money is to be used as far as possible to give employment, so that it can be earned as payment for services rendered.

Therefore if my friend the Senator from North Carolina had 500 of these bills, it would have been necessary for him to have acquired them, as he is not upon the unemployment list—and I know he is employed dealing with office hunters from his home. If he were on the unemployed list, he would not have as many as 500 dollar bills, and whatever number he did have, he would get them in a legitimate way, and not primarily as a gift. But when they pass on out through this unemployment relief program, when they get into the hands either of the merchants who sell supplies for the unemployed, or when they get into the hands of laborers who do work upon public-works programs which are contemplated here, into whosoever hands they get, they will go to the stores in the purchase of goods, they will go from the merchant to the jobber, from the jobber to the wholesaler, from the wholesaler to the manufacturer, and the manufacturer will buy raw materials.

The mere fact of a turnover of $3,000,000,000 a week, if used throughout the United States in the purchase of goods primarily, in the payment of debts, in active, hurrying circulation, every holder being anxious to pass the bills on before the stamp-tax day comes around, with that type of velocity stirred to a boiling point, the bills will pass with great rapidity in every community through every channel of trade in the United States.

Mr. President, what would be the effect of that? We all know the effect of an active use of a large sum of money in trade. It starts up buying power. The merchants would be ready to buy now if they knew there were customers able to pay. As soon as trade is stimulated in stores, the merchant puts in orders to the wholesaler for goods, the wholesaler puts in orders to the factories for goods, the factories order raw materials of all types used in the manufacture of industrial commodities. It would stimulate traffic upon the railroads in the hauling of raw materials, and then in the hauling of the manufactured goods, and all up and down in every channel in the country, just like the circulation of blood in the body, there would be stimulated trade activity, there would be provided this great sum of money which would be liquidating itself through the activity of those who used it, and this great sum of money would be provided thereby for the liquidation of debts.

Mr. President, so many people owe others, and others owe them. Neither can pay. If one could pay, the next could pay; and in that way, by keeping the money in a stream of circulation, it would undoubtedly follow that literally many billions of dollars of the present crushing indebtedness would be reduced or paid in full.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. While I was out of the Chamber the Senator may have covered the point I desire to inquire about; but I am wondering why he stopped at $1,000,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I know what the Senator has in mind. There are two reasons why, in the exercise of my judgment, I stopped where I did. In the first place, I thought that a billion dollars would circulate so fast that it would stimulate business in such a great way that it would increase commodity prices so fast that it would be necessary to stop the commodity index price at some reasonable point before it got back to the price of 1926.

Mr. President, I did not make the figure higher for another reason. I knew the claim that would be made about the danger of inflation. While it may be that a larger sum could be used, I knew that the larger the sum included in this bill the less likelihood there would be of a Congress conservative on the currency question adopting any amount. I figured that a billion dollars would be adequate and sufficient for the purposes, and for that reason I did not include a larger amount.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, the thought that was in my mind was that if we open the door to a billion dollars' worth of scrip we may never be able to close it again.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So long as the people pay the price of it, is any injury done? So long as they liquidate it themselves, with their own tax, so long as those who use it liquidate it and get the benefit of it, is any serious damage done?

Of course, the plan is intended solely to operate to check in some way the constant decline of prices and contraction of credit, to serve, if you please, as a temporary self-liquidating plan, and not as a permanent plan in our currency system. If it has any benefit—if it furnishes a medium of circulation for the purchase of the necessities of life and for the payment of debts—then I submit it is reasonable to assume that a new confidence will be established. If prices are stopped in their constant decline and perhaps started upward, people will again begin to buy with the money that they have, because we all know they postpone purchases so long as it looks like prices may continue to decline.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BANKHEAD. With pleasure.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the attractiveness of the scheme should become contagious and the Senator's enthusiasm for it likewise should become contagious and we should reach, let us say, a total of $10,000,000,000 of scrip, does the Senator think we would be approaching a point where the scrip would cease to carry a safe value generally?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It might approach the point of saturation and, of course, if it did we would not issue any more.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator think there is a menace, because of the very situation which we are now discussing, in attaching Federal auspices to a proposition of this nature? If I may amplify the question, I have studied most sympathetically the entire proposition for sometime and I have come to the conclusion that it is thoroughly practical, for instance, within a municipal unit on the basis of municipal offices and dealing with municipal pay rolls, and so forth, because there is no opportunity for confusion as between the scrip and actual money. Does the Senator feel that he is opening the door to no menace or hazard whatever when he has scrip and currency on the same Federal basis?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not see any reason why there should be confusion. The forms of the money in the first place will be different. One side of the scrip does not look like money at all. It simply contains a certificate that it is legal tender, as pointed out in the bill, with spaces upon which stamps will be affixed. I can not conceive that there could be any confusion by anybody capable of handling even $1 bills, about whether this money was the stamped scrip or the present legal currency.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did not use the word "confusion" in respect of the physical aspect of money. I was thinking of the menace of two types of Federal money, one competing against the other ultimately, as all cheap money competes with dear money. The Senator is undertaking to differentiate this entirely as being different from money. I am wondering whether he succeeds in escaping that confusion, using "confusion" in that sense?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I fear the Senator misunderstood my statement. I have attempted to distinguish it as a different type of money, and I have clearly pointed out that it is legal tender and therefore is a money which the Constitution authorizes Congress to issue. In other words, we have various forms of money now. We have gold certificates, silver certificates, gold dollars, and silver dollars. One is just as much a legal tender as the other. One is as much a part of our currency system as the other. Each is recognized because of the familiarity of the people with them over long years of use.

The difficulty, permit me to point out to the Senator, and the point for which I am seeking here a remedy, is this. It is not my remedy. It is not Prof. Irving Fisher's remedy. It started in Austria and Germany, but Professor Fisher has taken it up, and I am adopting it from him. The thing for which we are seeking a remedy is to get money in some form that does not impair the gold standard, that will stay out of hoarding, that will not find its way into the banks to rest, but will keep moving day after day in the purchase of goods and the payment of debts.

We can not do that with our present currency. We all know that during the last year we have issued nearly $1,000,000,000 of currency. In 1929 we had slightly less than $5,000,000,000 of currency in circulation. Now we have $5,600,000,000. But we know it is not in circulation. We know why that quantity of money has been issued since 1929. A great deal of it has been issued, under the Glass-Steagall bill and the Glass-Borah amendment, backed by the credits of the Government on its bonds. But it has been issued, even though it may have but a 40 per cent gold coverage, simply because money in such great quantities was finding its way into hiding.

As depositors day after day went to their banks and called for currency and it was handed to them, the available quantity of currency became exhausted.

There was not enough available for this great hoarding and also to provide the ordinary average quantity for pocket and till purposes. Therefore, we had to resort to the issuance of new currency, but it keeps going the same way. I do not know how much longer it will continue to find hiding places.

I am one of those who believe that the most effective thing the Congress could do would be to place an absolute guaranty of $1,000,000,000 or more to guarantee the depositors in the banks of the country. I think we are wasting our efforts by trying to sustain banks here and there as they grow feebler and feebler and are about to fall over the precipice. We are permitting banks here and there to fail, and that discourages depositors in other banks throughout the country. Credits are contracted as a result of the fear of the banks. The people are frightened and they either can not or will not buy goods. So the contraction goes on, and the danger all the time to our business fabric is the situation of the banks of the country.

In my judgment, Mr. President, we can save a great amount of money, considered from that standpoint alone, if we boldly enact a law here by so placing $1,000,000,000 or more guaranty behind bank deposits and taking all the money the Reconstruction Corporation is using in self-liquidating projects and trying to sustain failed or failing banks, and let all the depositors and all the banks of the country know that no other depositor in a bank would lose his deposit. In my judgment, with that notice to the country, depositors would not only quit withdrawing their funds, but we would induce the hoarders, who are keeping their money hidden now and out of the banks, to carry their money back to the banks. That in itself would not only strengthen the banks, but would create an additional basis of bank credit and stimulate business and in my judgment it would come nearer stopping this day-by-day sliding downward over the precipice.

But apparently those who are dealing with banking and credit here propose to take the route of giving credit here and there. I would take the other route if I had my way. But being unable to secure any such guaranty which would bring a restoration of confidence to the depositors and the hoarders, then I say that it is essential that we do find some other form of exchange between the people and to find some form of currency, some form of money, which will be used and accepted for the purchase of goods and must be accepted for the payment of debts and which will not be hoarded and which will liquidate itself. The plan has been brought here for the consideration of the Senate.

As I said in the beginning, I have no illusion about the attitude of the majority of the Senate upon any question that is not approved by those who hold the gold standard as sacred. This has been tested here time and time again. I know what disposition will be made of the proposition at this time. I have presented it merely in the hope that it may be given thoughtful consideration by those who are seriously and anxiously looking for some way to save our social and political institutions.

It is easy to reject and it is the custom here to reject, but if I am wrong I want to know it just as much as anybody in the world. I have no pride of opinion in this matter, because it is not of my origin. After careful study I am convinced that its adoption would be of tremendous value and service to the people of the country.

If anybody points out any vital error in the scheme, any weakness or fallacy in it, any reason why it would not operate as I believe and have indicated I think it will operate, I should be happy to receive such a thought, because I know we must not make many more bad mistakes. But I do believe, Mr. President, that we need action. We need to do something. We need to move in some direction. We need to travel some new road.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Let us say that I have in my possession at this time 500 of these certificates. Upon each of the certificates there have been placed twenty-six 2-cent stamps. It is my understanding of the Senator's proposal that none of the certificates is redeemable until the required and designated number of 52 stamps are on each of the certificates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct, because the man who paid a dollar for it in goods or services at the time there are only 26 stamps on it is entitled to pass it on.

Mr. REYNOLDS. As I understand it, I have in my possession 500 certificates each bearing 26 stamps. None of those certificates is redeemable until after the last of the 52 stamps has been placed on it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Let us assume further that with these 500 certificates in my hand, 26 stamps being affixed to each one, I am not indebted to a single soul on earth; what am I going to do with those certificates?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say, in the first place, that if the Senator is so fortunate as that, he could well afford to lose them, but he would be in a lonesome company. [Laughter.] However, the Senator could buy something with them.

Mr. REYNOLDS. But suppose I am not desirous of making any purchases?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, does not the Senator eat?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Very seldom. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, if the Senator is that kind of an animal, I can not place him. [Laughter.]

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I am interested in the Senator's proposal, and I am directing these inquiries to him because I want to be fully advised in regard to the matter. I think the suggestion has a great deal of merit, to be perfectly frank——

Mr. BANKHEAD. In that spirit I will be glad to answer any question which the Senator may submit.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am merely desirous of securing information. If I have, say, 500 certificates, with 26 stamps affixed to each one, and not one of them is redeemable until such time as 52 stamps shall have been attached to each, would it be possible, I not being indebted to anyone in any amount, for me to get full advantage of the certificates in my possession, upon each of which those who had previously handled them had placed 26 stamps?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that he could pay his taxes with them, if he owed any taxes. If he did not owe anything on earth and did not want anything on earth, then I frankly concede that he would be in some difficulty.

Mr. REYNOLDS. But they would have served their purpose——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not conceive in practical application, in view of the conditions prevailing in this country, that many dollars of this character of money would accumulate in the hands of men of the type the Senator has indicated. I think it is possibly in negligible amount and in the rarest kind of instances that a situation such as the Senator describes is imaginable and possible.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I grant, I will say to the Senator, up to that point that the certificates would have served a very meritorious cause by reason of the fact that there would have been paid on indebtedness of $500 twenty-six different times. That is true, is it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and I am glad the Senator brought out that point. As I say, I think in the workings of almost any plan there is some possible place where it will not operate with uniformity and exact justice, but considering the great volume of debts that money of the character I propose would pay, the great number of people that it would put to work, the meritorious features of the proposal from every other standpoint, and looking at it from a broad viewpoint, whether it would not do much more good than harm, I hope the Senator, from that standpoint, after he concludes his study of this measure, may find his way clear to be a believer in it and a supporter of the plan.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I wish to say to the Senator, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I wish to say that I think in the Senator's plan there is a great deal of merit, and I want to repeat that I am directing these inquiries to him because I am initially interested in his plan.

There is one further inquiry I should like to make pertaining to line 15, on page 5, where there is a provision which I was just discussing with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL], which reads as follows:

(i) Banks of deposit receiving such certificates as deposits may charge 2 cents for each certificate so deposited as a service charge.

Do I understand that to mean that I may deposit a certificate in a bank only for collection from the Government after the required 52 stamps have been placed thereon?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. It is intended during the movement of the certificates from the time of their issue that where the certificates are deposited in the banks, not used in trade, not in payment for the purchase of goods, not in payment of ordinary debts which a man is glad to have paid at a discount of 2 per cent, but where they are deposited in banks, involving bookkeeping and handling, noninterest transactions, the 2-cent charge may be made. I will say to the Senator further that one of the chief objects of that provision is to keep these certificates out of the banks, making it burdensome and costly to put them in, so as to keep them moving in constant circulation, paying debts and buying goods and services.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another inquiry?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Let us say that I have in my possession another 100 of these certificates upon one of which 2 stamps have been placed, and on others of the certificates 3, 4, or 5 stamps, as the case may be; in other words, on each and every one of those 100 different certificates there is a different number of stamps; do I understand the Senator to mean that under the provision I have quoted I shall deposit the certificate in the bank for safe-keeping? I make the inquiry as to how the bank could possibly handle these certificates in any manner other than by way of putting them in a safe-deposit box. Otherwise it would be necessary for them in their bookkeeping arrangements to make a notation in the form of a description as to the number of stamps each and every one of the certificates had affixed to it. I merely want to be enlightened as to that point.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think it would require a safe-deposit box. It would be a character of money different in appearance and easily separable from other money. It could be put in any sort of a box one wanted, or outside of a box.

The bill requires, it will be noticed, that the spaces for the stamps shall be dated.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So there can be no confusion on that subject. One takes up a bill which shows that the next date for a stamp is the 1st day of March, and it is stamped up to that date. It is self-explanatory on its face and requires no bookkeeping.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in conclusion, from the inquiry of my clear-headed colleague from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], in whose judgment and sincerity I have real faith, as to the effect of this proposed money and its becoming so popular that it might run away in actual use and popularity, I judge that he has at present no serious doubt about its efficiency up to the amount I am proposing that we issue.

But, Mr. President, let us consider just for a moment the effect the issuance of money of this kind would have on this country at a time when money has disappeared, as everybody knows it has disappeared. We would have a billion dollars, when it was all issued, turning over absolutely at least once a week and which, it is estimated, might turn over three or four or even a greater number of times a week, so that in the course of a year it is entirely conceivable that this $1,000,000,000—which would be in circulation all the time, speeding up, finding a way into the possession of various individuals, just exactly the reverse from the present type of money in use, with a hoarder's tax hanging over it—would be capable of financing transactions of $150,000,000,000 a year. That is a great volume of business; and this money would liquidate itself, it would retire itself, and when it should go out of circulation it would leave some profit in the Treasury. Furthermore, it would be no burden upon the Nation's stock of gold and no burden upon the taxpayers. Consider the effect of a volume of $150,000,000,000 of transactions during the course of the next 12 months. Anybody who believes that it will have that effect—and I challenge them to investigate and consider and decide whether it will or not—should, I say, forego any mere hypercritical objection, any suspicion or any doubt or uncertainty, which is not based upon a firm conviction, in the face of an opportunity to bring relief to the distressed people of this country without injury to anybody.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I was out of the Chamber during a portion of the Senator's address, and perhaps the question I am about to ask has already been answered, but I should like to ask the Senator whether it is his opinion that banks generally would accept this type of money for deposit?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. President, I have no more information on that subject than has the Senator from New York, who is doubtless closer to the banking spirits than I am. I do not say that in any improper way, but the Senator from New York is on the Banking and Currency Committee and is in touch with these matters while I am not.

However, it does appear to me that the bankers, who are as deeply concerned with their own solvency as are any other business institutions, would welcome with open arms any system which, while not imperiling the gold standard, would tend to bring about a restoration of business, which would tend to increase the prices of commodities, which would bring larger deposits into their banks, which would create new purchasing power for the merchants, their principal customers, and which also, through the service charge, would enable them to make 2 cents on each check handled by them, running inevitably into large figures, and thereby being made an attractive and profitable proposition. It is the hope in large measure, Mr. President, that the certificates will not go to the banks, but if they do, that they will receive a friendly reception and a friendly feeling from the banking institutions of the country.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator does me too much honor in suggesting that I am familiar with the "banking spirits." I am no more familiar with them than is the Senator; I have no experience in banking at all; but I was interested in the question whether or not it is a fact that if a bank keeps this particular type of money longer than a week it would itself have to pay a tax upon it. That is true, is it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true, but the banker gets a profit; it does not cost the bank anything if it does not keep the certificate more than two weeks.

Mr. WAGNER. If an individual should deposit money of the type proposed, just as he now deposits the forms of paper money in use, does the Senator say that the bank itself, if the money were not withdrawn within a certain brief period of time, would charge the individual 2 cents per week?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; the bank gets 2 cents when the money comes in, even if it goes out next day. Then it is incumbent upon the bank to get it out within two weeks.

Mr. WAGNER. That is the point I want to bring out. It is incumbent upon the bank to get it out again?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is incumbent upon the bank to get it out, which they may do in numerous ways. In the first place, they can use the profit that they get to stamp it for a depositor, if they see fit. They can pay it out through pay rolls. They can pay it out on debts that they may owe. They can pay it out for taxes or any other purpose for which any other institution in this country can pay it out.

Just to epitomize briefly in conclusion, Mr. President, let me point out that this plan does not involve the gold standard; that it is a self-liquidating proposition; that it provides relief for unemployment; that it provides work on public improvements, such as roads, waterways, sewers, reforestation, and so forth. It starts up buying. It brings about velocity of circulation. It raises price levels. It increases bank loans and deposits. It is a tax on hoarding. It is no drain on the Treasury; but, on the other hand, produces a profit. It creates new currency, and therefore new credits. It creates demand for industrial goods. Raw materials will move. Factories will go to work to meet these new demands for goods. The number of trains naturally will increase, both in carrying raw materials from the factories and in carrying the manufactured goods for distribution. The lawyers, the doctors, the bakers, and the candlestick makers will have money to pay their rents, to pay their taxes, and other current and incidental obligations, as they are able to do when money is freely in circulation, and their clients and customers are put in position to earn money and get money, which they now can not do.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be happy to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator one question.

I believe that this certificate is really legal tender.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is.

Mr. GEORGE. But it is subjected to a tax of 2 cents on each transfer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Each Wednesday—once a week.

Mr. GEORGE. A tax of 2 cents at least once a week?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator in all seriousness whether a man having services to sell, or a dollar's worth of merchandise to sell, would not prefer to take and would not demand money which was not subject to a 2-cent tax on each transfer, or per week?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The question of the Senator is a perfectly proper one, and one that of necessity requires consideration in connection with this plan.

Under normal conditions, I will say to the Senator, no one would propose a taxed money. Under conditions where services were scarce, or where the merchant held goods in quantity with an abundance of buyers, we might look to some other plan for consideration. In normal times, if you should go to a merchant and want him to take money that he must discount at 2 per cent, naturally he would not do it. But let me suggest to the Senator that when the merchant's store is almost empty, when the customers come more through curiosity than with any intent to purchase, and especially when they come without the ability to pay, I submit that even though the merchant may raise his price 2 cents to meet the stamp tax he will be happy to find a situation where he can again turn over his goods and have his store a busy place.

Mr. GEORGE. The objection which I raise, Mr. President, kept recurring to my mind. I understand the Senator's position to be that under these abnormal conditions, when merchandise is not moving, and there is no demand for services or commodities, what is equivalent to a tax on each transfer would not be an insuperable objection to the issuance of this type of currency.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is exactly the idea.

I have given careful consideration to that phase of the matter. I have recognized that a man can not be made to exchange either his goods or his services for any sort of money, even gold, if he does not want to do it. Therefore it is a matter of the state of mind of those engaged in business, and their willingness to cooperate in a program which brings to them an enlargement of their business.

This plan has been tried where it was not even legal tender. I understand that out in Hawarden, Iowa, and in other places, it was tried by mutual consent. It has been tried in Germany and in Austria and it is working. According to information given me by Professor Fisher, at some place in Austria it has been in operation for five months, and his reports directly from there are that it is highly successful, greatly pleasing, and beneficial to the business interests of the community.

So I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia, under these abnormal conditions, will not be an insuperable obstacle. In fact, when you go out with a campaign of this kind, with the slogan, "Stamp out the depression; stamp out unemployment; stamp on the money; create business and trade; give a hundred men a job; give a hundred men emergency relief," I take it that there is a degree of patriotism in this country, or a degree of self-interest in this country, combined, adequate to stimulate and arouse from one section of this country to the other the feeling, which will be acted upon, that "here, at last, is some relief furnished to us by a slow and reluctant Congress."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD at this point the amendment which I have proposed and on which I have spoken this afternoon.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BANKHEAD to the bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be engraved and printed currency of the United States in the form of stamped money certificates. Said certificates shall be in the denomination of $1 each, and the issue shall be limited to $1,000,000,000. Said certificates shall be of a suitable size to provide space on the backs thereof for affixing 52 postage stamps. The backs of said certificates shall be prepared in such manner as to indicate clearly the proper place for affixing each stamp contemplated herein to the end that on the second Wednesday after the issuance of said certificates from the Treasury the first stamp shall be affixed, and thereafter on each Wednesday until a total of 52 stamps shall be affixed; and said certificates in the spaces designated for affixing said stamps shall set forth the day of the month and year when each such stamp shall be affixed, as for example:

"'On April 5, 1933, affix 2-cent stamp here.'

"The face of said certificates shall set forth substantially the following:

"'This certificate is legal tender for $1 for payment of all debts and dues, public and private, customs, duties, and taxes: Provided, That on the date of its transfer there shall be affixed 2-cent postage stamps for all dates prior to such date of transfer, as set forth in the schedule on the back hereof. When fifty-two 2-cent postage stamps shall been affixed this certificate shall be redeemable at any post office for $1 lawful money of the United States.'

"(a) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to issue the certificates directed to be issued hereunder in monthly or semimonthly installments, all of like tenor and effect except that the schedule for the affixing of the stamps on the back of said certificate shall bear dates for the affixing of stamps appropriate to the date of the issue of each such installment of certificates.

"(b) When such certificates appropriately stamped in full shall be presented to the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption he shall certify to the Postmaster General from time to time the amount of certificates so presented for redemption, and the Postmaster General shall thereupon pay to the Secretary of the Treasury out of the funds arising from the sale of stamps the sum of $1 for each such certificate so redeemed, whereupon said certificates shall be destroyed.

"(c) Prior to the issuance of the first installment of certificates hereunder the Secretary of the Treasury is directed, by posters to be hung in post offices and other public places, and by advertising in newspapers and magazines, to advise the public of the contemplated issue of these certificates, with appropriate directions to the public with reference to the affixing of stamps, the legal-tender quality of the certificates, their redemption feature, and all such similar information. There is hereby appropriated for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury to defray the cost of such advertising the sum of $100,000.

"(d) When such certificates shall have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury the person holding the same, on and after 12.01 o'clock antemeridian of the first Wednesday set forth in the schedule on the back of said certificates, shall affix in the space therein provided a 2-cent postage stamp of the United States. Prior to such time said certificates in the hands of all holders shall be legal tender for the payment of all debts for the sum of $1. After affixing the first stamp said certificate shall be legal tender as aforesaid for the payment of all debts until the following Wednesday when another 2-cent postage stamp of the United States shall be affixed by the person holding the same prior to 12.01 o'clock antemeridian of such Wednesday, and thereafter for fifty consecutive additional Wednesdays like postage stamps shall be affixed by the holders. At all times when there shall be affixed all such postage stamps as are required to be affixed on the back of such certificates prior to the date of transfer, such certificates shall be legal tender as aforesaid for the sum of $1. When fifty-two 2-cent stamps shall have been affixed on the back thereof the holder may present the same to any post office in the United States for redemption, and the same shall be redeemed by such post office in any present lawful money of the United States. All post offices in the United States are hereby charged with the duty of making such redemption and of forwarding such certificates for cancellation to the Secretary of the Treasury.

"(e) With respect to such certificates as shall become unfit, through use, for further circulation, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General are authorized and directed to provide for the exchange of such worn-out certificates for new certificates, and to make all regulations required for that purpose.

"(f) It is declared to be against the public policy of the United States to provide in any contract executed subsequent to the date of this act that the certificate to be issued under this act, or any like issue, shall not be received in the discharge of such contract, and all such provisions in such contracts are hereby declared null and void.

"(g) Said certificates, when accepted by the Government, shall be promptly reissued by any department or agency of the Government receiving the same.

"(h) In transactions of less than $1 such certificates are not legal tender unless stamped by the person tendering the same for one additional week after tender.

"(i) Banks of deposit receiving such certificates as deposits may charge 2 cents for each certificate so deposited as a service charge.

"(j) The Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General are authorized to promulgate regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

"(k) If and when the wholesale commodity price level of all commodities, included by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in computing index numbers of wholesale prices, shall equal 80 per cent of the average index number for the year 1926, then, anything to the contrary herein notwithstanding, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to discontinue the issuance of certificates hereunder, and such certificates as are then outstanding shall be retired as the same are presented for redemption or replacement of worn-out certificates.

"(1) Five hundred million dollars of the amount made available under section 2 of this act shall be apportioned among the States on the basis of population according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census. This amount is made available as herein provided in addition to the amount made available to the States under section 4 (a) of this act. The amount so apportioned to the States shall be delivered to the governor of the State applying for the apportionment made to his State, upon application being made therefor by the governor. The amount apportioned to a State shall be administered within the State under rules and regulations adopted by the governor thereof and through such agencies as he may establish. The amount apportioned to a State may be by the governor thereof apportioned to the counties, and/or to the municipalities of said State, and may be used in construction work or for emergency relief as defined in section 11 of this act."

On page 14, line 6, after the word "act," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "except as herein otherwise provided."

On page 15, line 21, strike out "Forty" and insert in lieu thereof "Twenty."

On page 16, line 8, strike out the words "The balance of the amount made available under section 2 (a) of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Thirty per cent of the amount made available under section 2 of this act."

Mr. FESS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is kind enough to yield to me. I desire to present, for the consideration of the Senate, a unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That after the hour of 6 o'clock p. m. no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 30 minutes upon the pending bill (S. 5125) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment or motion relating thereto.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say to the Senators on the other side of the aisle that this agreement has been referred to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and meets with his approval.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the hour at which this agreement will start?

Mr. McNARY. Six o'clock this evening.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I can anticipate what is in the mind of the able Senator from South Carolina. If this agreement or a similar agreement is entered into, I shall ask an adjournment until 11 o'clock to-morrow, in order to have two hours upon the calendar, which will meet his situation, I am sure.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think the objection we had anticipated has now been removed; and I do not think it would take more than 15 or 20 minutes, if so long as that, to dispose of the matter I have in mind if I can get the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will not the Senator from South Carolina let us ascertain whether we can get this agreement?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly. I prefer to have that done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, for several days I have been desirous of addressing the Senate on the subject of inflation. This would be a very opportune time to do it, following the statement of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. It is going to take some time to do it; and if we are inclined to limit the debate before I have an opportunity to address the Senate, while I will not object, I will not attempt to do it to-night, but will reserve the right to do it to-morrow before we adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I shall not go on to-night, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the matter I have in mind is of such importance, and time is of the essence of it, and I do not know of any objection, that I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not consent to lay aside this matter temporarily and let us consider the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether or not he has consulted with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]?

Mr. SMITH. I have.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have just gone out to get him.

Mr. KING entered the Chamber.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was inquiring whether the junior Senator from Utah had withdrawn his objections to the bill which the Senator from South Carolina seeks to get up by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. I have not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I could not yield to the Senator, because I have been informed by the junior Senator from Utah that it will take him a considerable period of time to outline in full his objections to this measure.

Mr. KING. I will say to my friend that I shall be very glad to confer with the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Tennessee during the evening, or before to-morrow, and see if there is not a possibility of our agreeing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina if that would not meet with his approval, inasmuch as the Senator from Oregon has promised him a morning hour to-morrow if he requires it?

Mr. SMITH. I shall be very glad to do that, because this is a matter of great importance.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate has concluded its work to-day it adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I stated at the beginning of my remarks that I had no hope that the Senate would adopt this amendment. I wanted to get it before the Senate for consideration, in the hope that after further investigation by Members of the Senate it might receive favorable action, either along this line or some other line. Having had the opportunity to present the matter, I do not care to insist upon it at this time, and I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his amendment. The amendment of the committee is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has another amendment, and I think it should be offered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that that amendment was proposed, and that the question is on that amendment now, as the amendment of the Senator from Alabama has been withdrawn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that before the Senate acts on that amendment, the Senator from Kentucky desires to propose an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, as I understand it, there is a general agreement that I shall have an opportunity to take the floor to-morrow to make an address on inflation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator reserved that right when the unfinished business is laid before the Senate to-morrow, provided some other Senator has not the floor at that time talking on some other matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to move to strike out subsection (b) at the bottom of page 2 of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. GEORGE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask if the amendment referred to now by the Senator from Kentucky has been offered by the Senator from New York?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; it has been offered as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is offered as a substitute for the pending bill.

Mr. WAGNER. If I may make a parliamentary inquiry, the proposed substitute is subject to amendment now, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is subject to amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the substitute, to strike out subsection (b) at the bottom of page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will state to the Senate that the language which I seek to strike out is the new language sought to be put into the law, that—

> No part of the amounts paid to the governor of a State or Territory under this section shall be used for the payment of administrative expenses incurred in furnishing relief and work relief under this section.

Under the administration of the $300,000,000 heretofore made available to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for loans to States, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has set aside a small percentage in most of the States for the purposes of administration. Under that policy they have set up local organizations, some of which they have been compelled to compensate. If we say in this proposed amendment to the act that none of the money appropriated or made available shall be used to pay for administration of the act, it will mean that all the agencies which have been set up in the States under the direction of the governors for the administration of this relief will collapse, and there will be no agency through which the governor can administer the relief or make the distribution, because the cities and counties have not the agencies in existence and the amount of money involved, which has been approved by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has been so comparatively small that I see no reason why there should be injected now a provision that none of the money we appropriate shall be expended to pay for any administration agencies or other facilities with which we propose to make the distribution.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the provision which the Senator seeks to strike out was not proposed by me, and it was not in the original bill as I proposed it. It was incorporated in the bill by the committee at the suggestion of one member of the committee.

I sympathize with the views of the Senator from Kentucky, and I shall personally not resist his efforts. Of course, it is a matter which the Senate itself must determine.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it seems to me that this provision should remain in the bill under all circumstances. This is not a denial of the right of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to use money in its hands for administrative purposes. This is a denial of the right of the governor of a State to take a part of the money which we turn over to him for distribution, and use it for administrative purposes.

When it is borne in mind that there are no restrictions on the governor, that he may hire as many people as he wishes to hire, that he may pay as many salaries as he wishes to pay, and that he may pay as high salaries as he wishes to pay, it may be realized that an abuse of the generosity and bounty of the Congress is possible if the State is not required to pay at least the actual cost of disbursing the money that is turned over to it for general relief work within the State.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there had been in the original act appropriating $300,000,000 a provision of this sort, and if the States had been able to work out, over the period of a year, when their legislatures were in session, some local machinery for the distribution of this money and the administration of the relief, the Senator's position might be well taken. But, as a matter of fact, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has exercised jurisdiction and control over the amount that is allowed to be used for administrative purposes. For instance, in the State of Kentucky they have allowed an amount of less than 5 per cent of the total amount for administration. They do not seek to set up the agencies. The governor has no power, under the laws of most States, to create new offices or to pay out of the State treasury for offices that are not actually created by the legislature.

Many of the State legislatures, particularly my own, will not meet until 1934. If the agencies which have been set up by the governor, with the consent of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, for the administration of the $300,000,000 we have already made available to them, are now to be abolished and destroyed by our providing that none of this money can be used for that purpose, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has permitted them to use it up to this time, then it will amount to a denial of relief.

I will say that, under the control of the governor of my State—and I am sure it is true of other States—very meager compensation has been allowed to those who have been employed to help distribute the relief. They are experts. They are people, men and women, who have been long expert in relieving social distress. They know who are fakers and they know who are not. They have for a long time been in the business of relieving suffering, and they are getting compensation so small that it is difficult to understand how they themselves may sustain their lives upon it. But if we take it away from them entirely we will practically deny relief in many of the States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I had a communication from an official of my State, one representing the governor, to the effect that if this provision remained in the so-called Wagner substitute it would be practically ineffective in my State, that they had no means of distributing this money without using a part of the money for the purpose of administration.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is true of most of the States, I will say. There are some few of the States where there has been no request for an allotment for expenses of administration, but in most of the States—I think all but five or six—the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, out of the amount allotted to the States, has allowed the governors to use a certain small percentage for administration, and it has been so small in all cases that there has been certainly no abuse of it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me further, I will say that in my State a certain amount has been allowed.

Mr. GEORGE. I am so certain that this language should not be stricken out of the bill that if action is to be taken on it I shall have to ask for a quorum, and I did not want to do that on this matter.

If the desire is to get rid of the abuses, if the money may be turned over to the taxing authority of each political subdivision requiring it, a large sum will not be expended in distributing the funds.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not think that criticism is justified.

Mr. GEORGE. It may not be true of the Senator's State.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think it is true in a general sense anywhere.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is perhaps not fully informed about what may exist elsewhere if some restriction is not imposed.

The real way to prevent the expense attaching to this fund, and to get relief to those who really need it, is to put the money appropriated to each State into the hands of the taxing authority of the smallest political subdivision in the State requiring it, because those who administer it will know who is worthy of help and who is not worthy of help.

Now, let me say one further word. I realize that under the original relief measure the theory was that a loan would be made to a State, and we contemplated that there should be paid back by the State, out of future appropriation, it is true, the money allotted to it. But that theory of a loan is fading farther and farther into the distance, and under the present proposal for relief purposes a part of the money is an outright grant to the State, not to be charged against it at all, and not to be repaid by it under any circumstances, even as a matter of bookkeeping. It does seem to me that a State could afford to accept money under those conditions and pay the small amount of actual and necessary administrative cost. That is the only check upon the dissipation of some portion of this money, at least, however conscientiously the fund may be administered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say to the Senator that, speaking broadly and generally, his theory is correct, but I certainly regret to see him take the position he has indicated here. I am sure the Senator does not appreciate the effect upon his neighbors. I know the Senator has a kind heart, and that he is not taking his position capriciously. But I want to present our own local position to him. We are neighbors, and he probably knows about our condition, but has not thought about the effect of his position.

We are unfortunate in my State in the matter of financing, probably more so than any other State in the Union. There is a deficit in Alabama of $20,000,000. There are $12,000,000 of warrants outstanding for the poor schoolteachers, who can not be paid. There is to-day an injunction tying up even the salaries of State officials. We have a budget law under which they can not pay out more than the amount of taxes received, and the taxes received are less than the necessary operating expenses of the State government.

Mr. President, so far as waste is concerned, let me call to the attention of the Senator the fact that in my State—and for my State I am making this appeal to him—our governor is one of the most frugal of governors. He is so economical and close that he even burns a kerosene lamp instead of an electric light in his own home. He endeavored to conduct the affairs of the State along the same line. We know there would be no waste there. But we have not the money. We can not get it. If the Senator insists upon this amendment and it prevails, as it probably would, because I know his influence in this body, it would be very detrimental to my State.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator how the flour and cotton are dispensed by the Red Cross in his State? Is it not done without expense to the fund?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is done by the Red Cross, probably with local contributions. I do not know whether they do it without expense to the fund or not.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly they do. The mayor of every city, the local officers of the city and county perform this service without compensation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is like everything else. I do not think that would make a particle of difference with the administration in my State. If the Senator insists upon this and it prevails, and I know his influence in this body, he is simply depriving Alabama of any of the benefits under this bill. We have horrible suffering, especially in my district.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator knows I would not want to deprive the State of Alabama or any State of any help. The Senator is entirely wrong. There is no State in the country that can not take care of the administrative costs of dispensing a fund of this character.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I happen to know more about Alabama than does the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sure the same situation exists in other States, but I give my own as an example. Every application on the part of individuals and families for relief under this act would be investigated so as to prevent waste. It is investigated by men and women who are trained in that sort of thing. Under our law neither the county officers nor the governor can employ such investigators and pay them out of the treasury of the State. I believe that in the administration of the law and the use of the trained forces, paid a very small compensation compared to their real worth, that money has been actually saved and by that method it has been prevented from finding its way into channels where it might be wasted. In my State it is not paid to them in cash. It is paid in supplies and groceries. In each case the application and the merits of the family and individual are investigated by somebody trained in that sort of thing, who holds no political office and therefore has no political ax to grind. I think that method of administration will certainly save more of this money than to take away any power to use any of it for that purpose.

Mr. GEORGE. Has not the Senator's State a public-welfare department?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; we have no public-welfare department as such in the State. We have a State health department, but we have no public-welfare department as it is termed in other States. Under the State law we have authority for the county judge, for instance, to allow out of the treasury of the county certain small funds for the purchase of supplies for indigent people. In all of our counties that fund was exhausted long ago, and that fact was largely responsible for our application to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for an allotment of funds.

But there is no way for the Governor of Kentucky or anybody in the State administration or any officer of any county to employ expert investigators to go out and find out whether an applicant is meritorious or not. This small allotment or small percentage of the fund agreed to by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for that purpose has been instrumental, I think, in keeping down any criticism that the money is being wasted or is finding its way into channels where it is not deserved.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I may say that just to-day the Governor of Florida was here and within the hour told me that this provision ought to come out of the bill if Florida is to get any benefits under it. He said the State has no fund nor has he as governor any fund out of which to pay, and that there is no way to handle the matter if the governor or the State must bear the expense. We have voluntary associations in different parts of the State. They act in an advisory capacity.

But I agree fully with the Senator from Kentucky; and our situation is just as he has mentioned, that the voluntary associations are not as efficient and will not save to the Government what is being paid by reason of the expert investigation. The fund is distributed according to the needs of the different counties. The report comes to the governor that a certain county needs so much. There is a voluntary association that acts as an advisory council, and he takes their views. When we have experts trained in this very matter of determining where real need is and the circumstances connected with it, we get a much better service and a real saving from the fund. But we have no way of compensating those people in our State. The governor has no fund with which to do it. The expense has been small, none of it exceeding 10 per cent, and probably not over 5 per cent. I quite agree with the Senator from Kentucky in his view on the matter.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. In my own State this question of cost could not arise, because we have an organization created by the State, and also by the municipalities, that has government employees who would distribute the money. I have heard of no abuses of the administration of the funds from any member of the board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I would not want to have any provision in the bill, which is to be used as an instrument to aid the destitute, which in effect would prevent such relief. Therefore, I would suggest a compromise perhaps that might be acceptable to the Senators whose views differ on the question. I think the power exists now, but it may be expressed by legislation. Let us authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to prescribe the limit of the amount of money which may be used for administrative purposes of the loan granted. I do not know whether that would satisfy Senators or not.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is what is being done now.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the power already exists.

Mr. BARKLEY. When our State makes application to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for a loan, we have a list of the counties with all of the evidence that has been gathered in those counties, which is presented to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and we are compelled to administer it in that way, not only as a whole but in each county. They have exercised absolute supervision over the amount which may be used for administration. I am not sure that they do it for each county, but for the State at large they do have a limitation, and that policy has been adopted. I do not think it is necessary to authorize them to do it, because they have already done it.

Mr. WAGNER. It might be something to assuage the apprehension of Senators and others.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate fully the disinterestedness of the motive of the Senator from Georgia, and I hope he will not contest this motion of mine, because it has worked satisfactorily on the whole. There may be exceptions to it. The injury that will be wrought by including this language would be so much greater than any injury that might come from an isolated case where somebody might get money or provisions that would not be merited; but I hope he will not resist my motion.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to call his attention to the fact that it is notorious that where we have voluntary distribution of charity such as this it is never done effectively or satisfactorily? It seems that since the States have gotton these allotments from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation certain trustworthy individuals, whose time is valuable and whose services could not be otherwise availed of without a reasonable compensation, can not be employed in this kind of work. In my own State those who talked to me over the long-distance telephone this afternoon were genuinely alarmed that if there is not some provision made by which trained men and women in whom they could have confidence might be employed to go out and ascertain the exact status of affairs it would be absolutely worthless to the State in its realization.

I know through my own experience that in a matter as serious as this, the like of which we have never before confronted, we ought to be willing to compensate those who are going out with Government funds to relieve those who absolutely need aid. The minute we put it upon the basis of voluntary assistance, it will be said, "Oh, well, it does not amount to anything. It is a gesture. It is not serious. Give it to Tom, Dick, and Harry." But this is a life-and-death proposition. There are people in every State in the Union standing face to face with absolute suffering.

May I make this suggestion? There are people in the different States who are brought to such a pass that they never expected to be brought to; who will not publicly and openly display the condition in which they find themselves. We do need tactful men and women to find out where pride is covering up suffering; where it is almost a life-and-death case. I think we can very well provide to compensate men and women of capacity to distribute the fund to relieve real suffering.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. May I say that it so happens that in the last hour I have had an opportunity of talking to Mrs. Tunstal, of Alabama, who is our child-welfare worker. By reason of that position, she has been largely instrumental in setting up the method of distribution of the funds of the State. Mrs. Tunstal said to me that, of course, they could give out the money without investigation, but that such a course would not be beneficial. She gave me the set-up which they have.

Each county has a subordinate under the child-welfare body. They each draw $100 or $125 a month from the fund. No part of that fund is payable out of the Government relief. However, on account of the widespread destitution, that fund has been depleted, and it was wholly and completely impossible to obtain accurate information on which to act. They have had in most of the counties four social workers drawing $50 per month out of the fund. She gave me the reports of these social workers. Some counties are very large. I am convinced that the money could not be properly distributed without this information.

I also know from the condition in the State and the counties that if this administrative appropriation is cut off, as the amendment proposes, it would simply limit the investigation to that which can be made by one person.

In addition, Mrs. Tunstal stated that in practically every county of the State they are giving work relief. They are doing that on the roads. The county is then compelled to buy the equipment. The county buys the material and furnishes the road overseer, who is regularly employed, so the county really spends a great deal more for administration in the manner in which it is done than it would cost if paid out of this fund. Mrs. Tunstal has informed me, and she is a most capable lady in her work, very much interested, that it would mean that it could not be properly administered in those counties or in most of the counties of Alabama.

I might add that Mrs. Tunstal is not drawing a dime from this fund; she is paid by the State; but it is wholly and completely impossible to administer this fund adequately without expert assistance. Many of those counties have cut off their child welfare workers, many of them have eliminated their farm bureau agent; they are in a desperate situation in so far as supplying funds is concerned. For these reasons it would seriously handicap Alabama in the administration of the fund if this amendment should be adopted in its present form. I wanted to give the facts which she has just given me.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I know it is perfectly natural for the governor of any State to endeavor to save all the money he can under present conditions. I would not expect the governor of my State, for instance, to do otherwise than to say that the administrative cost ought not to be put on the States; but I want to ask the Senators here what possible check have we upon the expenditure of this fund? I have full confidence in the governors, I wish to make plain. What restrictions have we got when we consider that this fund is now becoming a bounty, a direct bounty, to the States, as for all practical purposes it is, and we are passing the money out and we are saying to the States, "You are not even called upon to spend a dime to administer it and there is no restriction whatever placed upon the expenditure of this money"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that, after a skillful and careful survey by capable people, the money will be spent better than it will be just to spend it loosely on hearsay information when somebody applies for it?

Mr. GEORGE. I think so, perhaps——

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is our situation and our choice.

Mr. GEORGE. I think so, but I think the States ought to bear that cost or else provide for it in some other way.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. I will say that I am in thorough sympathy with the idea that there should be some kind of administrative supervision; and they have such supervision in Alabama. I do not know whether they have it in other States or not.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not speaking of any particular State.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that.

Mr. GEORGE. But I am speaking of the possibility of abuse, abuse amounting to scandal, in any State, if the officers of that State were so disposed to administer this fund.

Mr. BLACK. I think that is absolutely correct.

Mr. GEORGE. It is unquestionably true. We ought not, because our State governors ask the Federal Government to give them some money, to send it down and let them pay the cost of administering it out of the fund itself, and turn it loose in that way.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will yield further, I will state that I have not heard anything from the Governor of Alabama in connection with it, but I should like to suggest that some kind of an amendment be adopted limiting the amount that might be spent for administrative purposes, which I think would be an excellent thing and one that should be done; but I do believe that, with conditions as they are throughout the country, to provide now that no part of this fund could be used for administrative assistance would seriously handicap the proper distribution of the fund.

Mr. GEORGE. I am firm in my conviction—and my conviction grows out of experience—that the real way to distribute this fund in an agricultural State is to distribute it through the local taxing authorities and let them get it into the hands of those who are entitled to it without tolling it 10 per cent. I think it would be nothing more nor less than a scandal that money intended to help the poor and suffering should actually bear a charge of 10 per cent or even 5 per cent at the hands of the State authorities in whose State it is to be administered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia, I suppose, would result in turning the money over to the county officers or some one or more of them. The taxing authority is different in each State. I have felt, and I am satisfied the governors of the States have felt, inasmuch as this money was loaned to the States on their application and they were held responsible to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for its administration, that the method of administration that would result in the least criticism and the least waste and the least possibility of scandal would be to set up in each county small expert organizations trained in this sort of work, who would have no desire to use the money for their advancement or for any political reason or in contemplation of any poltical campaign that might be approaching. All of these things, of course, are a part of human nature, as we understand.

There is no one man in any State who can possibly audit the expenditure of all these funds in the different counties. I imagine that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation desired to send an agent into each county to audit the expenditure of these funds, there is nothing in the law that will prevent it, though I do not understand they have done it so far.

It might be that we could arrive at a fair average of the amount that would be needed in most of the States for administration; we might limit it to a certain percentage; but in view of the fact that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation not only has the power to limit it, but is doing it, it would seem to me that we are acting blindly——

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to his colleague?

Mr. GEORGE. I will yield to my colleague when the Senator from Kentucky has finished.

Mr. BARKLEY. We would be acting blindly here, without more information than we have, to set up a percentage beyond which they could not go in the administration of these funds. The conditions vary in the different States, and it may not be possible to fix an average percentage.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Kentucky has said on three or four occasions that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is now limiting the amount each county may expend for administrative expenses. I should like to know what that amount is?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not a uniform amount. They make an allotment for administrative purposes when they make the award or loan to the State.

Mr. RUSSELL. I think the Senator must be in error about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are seeking to control it; it may not be an exact figure in each case but they have taken the position that they have the right—and I think they have the right under the law—to say that not more than a certain percentage of the award or allotment, or whatever it may be called, to any State may be used for administrative purposes. They certainly have some supervision over the set-up.

In my State the governor appointed first an administrator and then he appointed an advisory committee. They served, I think, without compensation. That director of relief, whatever he may be called, is in touch with the agencies set up in all the counties. These agencies may or may not be composed of officers of the county.

I happen to know that in the city where I live, the city of Paducah, of thirty-five or forty thousand people, they have opened an office, and they have put in charge of it one or two competent people at a salary of $50 a month. That certainly is not any evidence of waste on the part of the governor or his relief director. If this language is put in this bill they must discharge forthwith, or whenever this fund begins to operate and the amount already appropriated is exhausted, every one of those employees in the different counties working at that very modest compensation whose duty it is to investigate all the separate cases where application is made for relief. I am only speaking of my State, because I do not know what the situation is in other States, but I imagine that on the average conditions are about the same. I happen to know that in my county there is no law under which the county officers can employ anybody to do the work that is being done by these $50-a-month employees, and they have either got to stop the relief or they have got to go about it in a haphazard way and, without sufficient investigation, turn over to anybody who applies either cash or its equivalent in supplies; and I think that that would be subject to greater criticism and would lay the foundation for greater waste and dissipation of the funds than is possible under the present plan.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in administering the credits of the agricultural credit corporation, which I have been looking into somewhat to-day, I find that the manager in my State, Maryland, receives $8,500 a year. I do not want to be critical; perhaps there is a good reason for that, but from the very brief investigation which I have made it seems to me that that was a rather high salary to pay for assisting farmers in getting seed loans at a time like this. It is nearly as much money as a United States Senator gets; and it strikes me that a salary of five or six thousand dollars a year would be very bountiful. I think there is a great deal, transferring that same idea to the matter in hand, in what the Senator from Kentucky says. However, may I point out to him that in many of the States the county authorities have already existing agencies?

For example, in Harford County, Md., we not only have a demonstration agent but we have a county nurse, we have a county health officer, and various individuals in similar categories, who are in intimate touch with the needs of the people there. It strikes me that there might be combined in an amendment what is in the bill as it is now written and what the Senator from Kentucky has in mind by providing for the case of States or counties or subdivisions where there is no provision for people to administer this fund; but I would be opposed to expending any money in my State for administrative purposes. I want to see the unemployed get every dollar of this money that it is possible for them to get and not have it used for salary purposes. I will concede, however, that there are States where, perhaps, that would not be a very good rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be that in the Senator's State they have taken more forward steps in organizing social welfare workers than they have in some other States, and I have no doubt that some of the counties of the State of Maryland are qualified and equipped to distribute this money or its equivalent. I understand it is not the policy in most States to pay actual cash, but the relief is paid in kind, so that there can be no criticism that men who obtain the money have used it for purposes wholly without the purview of the law. But, unfortunately, most of the States are not equipped with that sort of an organization.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. They have no such set-up, and their legislatures, in this situation, would not be willing, I imagine, to pass a law incurring that additional expense at this time. In my State——

Mr. TYDINGS. If I may interrupt the Senator, I concede that there is very good ground for the position he is taking; but I was seeking to safeguard this money for the unemployed wherever it could be done and to make an exception only where the exception was necessary.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, where it is operating, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is doing that now in States that are equipped to distribute it; they are not making any allowance for administration; but I am not quite sure that I am correct, but I believe that in eight States, if I am not misinformed—six or eight States—because of more advanced legislation, setting up these agencies, they are incurring no expense out of the fund for administration.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator, in order to make headway and see if we can come to some agreement about the matter, if he would be willing to strike out the words "no part" and insert "not exceeding 10 per cent," so that instead of saying that no part of these amounts shall be used for the payment of administrative expenses it would read that not exceeding 10 per cent of the amount paid shall be used for those purposes? I do not know whether that would be agreeable to the Senator from Kentucky or not.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there is going to be any limit, I prefer to leave it to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because I think they are working it out satisfactorily.

Mr. FLETCHER. I agree with the Senator; I think it ought to come out; but in case we can not do that, I was thinking that we could limit the amount to 10 per cent.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know what the sentiment of the Senate is on the subject. I should like at least to have an expression of the Senate on the question of eliminating it altogether.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I want to say that, in my judgment, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has no authority to limit the amount of money that is to be expended for purposes of administration. It has the power to superimpose its will upon the State authorities, because it has the power to make or not to make the loan. Therefore, as a condition on which it would make a loan to any State, it might prescribe a certain limitation upon the amount that could be used for administrative purposes.

As long as this appropriation was in the nature of a loan, and a loan at least chargeable to the State, there was some restraint and restriction on the expenditure of the money. I have already said, however, that it has become now practically a bounty to the State, and the expenditure will be without any restriction or any accountability; and certainly the Congress ought not to turn over its money without providing that the administrative cost shall be borne by the States receiving the benefit of the bounty, or else imposing some definite and fixed administrative charge that the State would be compelled to observe if it received any part of the money. I have no lack of confidence in the governors of the several States. I am insisting upon a principle.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before the Senator from Oregon makes his customary motion may I say a word? I shall not detain the Senate.

The subject before us is important, and my judgment concurs with the views expressed by the Senators from Kentucky, Florida, and Alabama. Both State and locally administered relief, to be effective and economical, requires the expenditure of reasonable amounts of money for administrative purposes.

At this time I wish merely to introduce in the RECORD a memorandum containing pertinent and valuable information on the subject under discussion. It deals with the cost of relief administration in the different parts of the country. The memorandum was prepared for my use this afternoon and is offered in the hope that it may be helpful to the Senate in reaching a final decision in the event the discussion continues until to-morrow.

The memorandum is accompanied by extracts from a statement recently made by Mr. Walter S. Ufford, the devoted and efficient general secretary of the Associated Charities in Washington, D. C. This statement also should appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Colorado will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COST OF RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

The report of the committee on administration of relief of the Chicago Conference on Maintenance of Welfare Standards, held November 18–20, 1932, under the auspices of the American Public Welfare Association with the cooperation of the Public Administration Clearing House and the School of Social Service Administration of the University of Chicago, made the following recommendations:

"An effective State administrative unit should be established for the direction and supervision of the expenditure of all State and Federal funds appropriated or borrowed for relief purposes.

* * * * * * *

"In any appropriation for relief a definite allocation of funds for administrative purposes should be included in order to insure proper standards of administration.

"Public welfare administration is a technical function of government and includes types of services which require properly prepared, qualified personnel."

STATE ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS

Expenditures for State administration of relief are necessary for the following purposes: (1) To enable the State to determine where local resources are inadequate and the amount of relief from State and Federal resources required; (2) to assist localities in setting up local relief administrations that will insure economical and effective administration of relief funds; (3) to obtain reports as to the manner in which relief appropriations have been expended.

The State administrations set up under State laws (see inclosed chart) and also under funds made available by the Reconstruction

Finance Corporation have found it necessary to expend funds for these purposes, as the following examples show:

New York: Appropriations for the temporary emergency relief administration provided by legislation of 1931 and 1932 covered $439,000 available for State administration, plus $100,000 available after approval of the creation of a State debt at the November, 1932, general election. The report of the administration for the period ending September 15, 1932, published October 15, 1932 (p. 13), showed that between November 1, 1931, and September 15, 1932, a total of $239,461.84, or somewhat less than 1 per cent, was expended or allocated for State administrative purposes. In the hearings on S. 5125, January 3 to 17, 1933 (p. 86), the chairman of the New York Temporary Emergency Relief Administration, Mr. Harry Hopkins, stated, "The foundation of the whole organization is on the basis of trained service. On top of it is much voluntary service." In reply to a question by Senator COSTIGAN as to whether it would be economical to endeavor to get along without trained assistance, Mr. Hopkins stated, "You could not do it. You are defeated on all fronts if you tried that." He further stated that they had a budget of about $30,000 a month for State administration, and that, in his opinion, the amount provided for Federal administration in the Costigan-La Follette relief bill, S. 5125, was very small.

New Jersey: The report of the New Jersey Emergency Relief Administration, dated January, 1932, showed a total of $40,707.87 expended for State administration from October 13, 1931, to January 1, 1932. Attention was called to the fact that this item was extraordinarily small, due to the fact that there were no charges for rent or office equipment and that department heads and principal assistants were obtained from corporations at their expense. The report contained the following comment (p. 22): "The developments of recent weeks have shown that it will not be possible to continue at the present level of expense. In spite of the attempt to build at once a strong organization, it is evident that it is not yet adequate, more particularly because of the breakdown of local facilities, in many places chiefly due to recent financial difficulties."

Wisconsin: The report entitled "Unemployment Relief in Wisconsin, 1932–33," published by the Industrial Commission of Wisconsin, February, 1933, shows that the $10,000 appropriated from the general fund of the State for State administration of unemployment relief proved insufficient and the commission was compelled to use $3,756 from a different appropriation and $5,385.62 from Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds to administer Federal aid from September 1 to January 1. The entire cost of State administration during 1932 was $19,142, or two one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the amount distributed to local communities (p. 25).

Illinois: The bulletin entitled "Fourth Interim Report Illinois Emergency Relief Commission, Third Interim Report Illinois Emergency Relief Commission (Federal)," January 20, 1933, showed expenditures of $189,498.32 disbursed for salaries and expenses of the Chicago office. This came from State funds and from Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds (p. 12).

Pennsylvania: Laws of 1931 and 1932 provided a total of $55,400 for various State officials for the administration of Federal relief funds from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Rhode Island: Laws passed in 1931 and 1932 provide $35,000 for State administration by the Unemployment Relief Commission and $5,000 for use by the State board of tax commissioners.

LOCAL ADMINISTRATION

Expenses for local administration are absolutely essential for the following reasons: (1) To eliminate cases not needing relief; (2) to provide against the duplication of relief by several relief agencies through a central relief clearing house; (3) to provide a means for determining how much relief is needed; (4) to provide service that will help the family to become self-supporting at the earliest possible moment.

The inclosed news bulletin on social statistics in child welfare and related fields, published by the Children's Bureau in September, 1932, contains a chart entitled "Percentage Expended for Relief and for Administrative Costs by Certain Types of Agencies During 1930 and 1931." Twenty-three departments giving general relief in eight metropolitan areas expended 10 per cent of their total disbursements in 1930 for administration, and 7.5 per cent in 1931. An excerpt from the testimony of Walter S. Ufford, general secretary, Associated Charities, Washington, D. C., at the hearing before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on the first deficiency appropriation bill for 1933, is inclosed herewith. This testimony called attention to experience in a neighboring city where from $300,000 to $400,000 per month is spent for relief. An experiment was undertaken for the purpose of determining whether or not reductions in the average number of relief cases per worker would result in a decrease of relief expenditures. A certain district of the city was chosen, and 18 visitors and 3 supervisors were added to the district staff, which before the experiment included only 12 visitors. At the end of seven weeks a total of $11,600 had been saved in relief at an additional cost of administration of $2,600, or a net saving in seven weeks of $9,000.

New York State: The report of the New York State Temporary Emergency Relief Administration referred to above shows that up to September 15, 1932, $565,674.12 had been paid out or allocated for reimbursement to cities and counties for salaries of employees in home relief and emergency work bureaus. The report sets out the systems of accounting and social records found to be necessary, the local central indexes that were set up, and the trained and experienced relief investigators that were required. "In several districts," the report states, "an immediate result of the employment of workers trained for this service was the elimination from the poor-relief lists of many welfare divisions of considerable numbers of long-time beneficiaries, with a consequent saving of funds for the relief of families whose needs were real and urgent" (p. 19).

Wisconsin: The report on unemployment in Wisconsin, published February, 1933, shows administration costs of 8 per cent, based on costs in 30 relief agencies in Wisconsin for the months of September to December, 1932 (p. 24).

Illinois: The Fourth Interim Report and the Third Interim Report of the Illinois Emergency Relief Commission, published January 20, 1933, show costs of administration from State and Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds of 8.46 per cent in Cook County, 6.59 per cent in other counties, or 8.68 per cent in all counties (p. 12).

STATEMENT OF MR. WALTER S. UFFORD, GENERAL SECRETARY ASSOCIATED CHARITIES, WASHINGTON, D. C., AT HEARING BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF HOUSE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS OF THE FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL FOR 1933 (PP. 78–79)

May I just add that in a neighboring city, where they are spending between $300,000 and $400,000 per month and where much of the money is from public appropriations, but is given to the private welfare agencies of that city to administer, they recently made an experiment which throws some light on this question of the so-called overhead. That is a question that we would like to consider in terms of actual service, and, with your permission, I would like to read you this letter that I received this morning from that city. I would like to read it because I know you are deeply interested in that part of the estimate. I read from the letter, as follows:

"The experiment was undertaken for the purpose of seeing whether or not reductions in average case load per worker would result in a decrease in relief expenditures. We chose the southwestern district where the average case load per worker was 188 families. The number of visitors in that district was 12. We decided to put in enough visitors to reduce the average case load to 75 families per worker, and to put in enough supervisors so that no supervisor would be required to supervise more than 10 workers. Actually we added 18 visitors and 3 supervisors to the district staff.

"At the end of the seventh week we had spent in additional salaries for workers about $2,600 and had made a gross saving of approximately $11,600 in relief. The net saving we figured was, therefore, in round numbers, $9,000 for the seven weeks.

"Since the months of October and November, during which the experiment was conducted, represented a period during which there is normally an increase in relief cases, relief per capita, and total relief, it was obviously unsatisfactory to calculate savings on the basis of actual previous expenditures of the district. We figured our savings, therefore, by comparing per cent change in six districts where there was no increase in the staff with the experience in southwest district.

"Of course, in some families relief was actually increased, when through a more intimate knowledge, undiscovered relief needs were found. The actual savings seem to have been brought about chiefly through the following: A number of families were found to have some person employed whose employment had not been reported to the district. Other families had reported to the worker a larger number of members in the household than actually existed. In a number of instances, through contact with previous employers and other persons, jobs were found for clients. Budgets were readjusted in some families. Some hitherto unknown resources, such as relatives, churches, etc., were discovered. It was possible by closer supervision for the worker to adhere more strictly to the relief policies of the association, and work orders were adjusted to conform more exactly to policies. A number of families withdrew their applications for relief or did not return to the office when they were put on a lower relief budget."

We have reason to believe that in the administration of public relief here in the District of Columbia everything possible is being done to save money, and to give help only where it is absolutely necessary. We question whether or not enough is being given. We do believe from experiences such as we have cited here, and from our own experience in social work, that the best money, you pay is for trained service, and that you save that money many times over by being able to do a constructive piece of work instead of handing relief out over the counter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I ask that it may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie upon the table.

ADDRESS BY HON. LOUIS LACHMUND ON PROHIBITION AND ASSOCIATED PROBLEMS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD an address delivered before the Oregon State Legislature by Hon. Louis Lachmund, of Salem, Oreg., on the subject of prohibition and associated problems.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ARGUMENT FOR A CHANGE IN OUR EXISTING PROHIBITION LAWS, WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO THE PROMOTION OF TEMPERANCE AND THE UPBUILDING OF OUR STATE AND NATION FROM AN ECONOMIC, MORAL, AND REVENUE STANDPOINT

The argument herein presented is limited to a discussion of a bill which has been introduced in our legislature having for its purpose the manufacture, sale, distribution of a malt beverage, its regulation, and revenue derived therefrom. Before discussing the question from a purely Oregon standpoint, it might be well to briefly touch the subject from a national standpoint.

Mr. Hoover made it very clear, as food administrator, that the manufacture of beer was of so much greater importance as a temperance and moral measure than the amount of material consumed in its manufacture, that he refused to yield to the pressure of organized drys.

What are the facts as to these raw materials? Coal, for example? The Anti-Saloon League, in its official organ, published in 1918 a statement attributed to coal administration that the brewing industry from 1916 to 1917, which was before prohibition, consumed 3,220,000 tons of coal. It stated that it would require 180,000 freight cars, or 3,700 freight trains, to haul this coal from the mines to the brewing plants. It further stated that the brewing industry consumed 69,000 cords of wood, 527,000 barrels of oil and gasoline, and over 3,649,000,000 cubic feet of gas for heat and fuel. The coal-mining industry of the country is to-day paralyzed. The railroads have been hit hard, and it is estimated that nearly 1,000,000 railroad employees are idle. Would it be an economic benefit to the country to put the coal operators and miners to work to-morrow morning mining 3,220,000 tons of coal for the brewing industry? Would it be an economic benefit to the country to start 180,000 freight cars rolling to-morrow hauling this coal from the mines to the brewing plants?

Bear in mind that the cars used in coal transportation for the brewing industry were only a part of the whole. It probably required more than ten times 180,000 cars to transport all the raw materials and finished products to and from the brewing plants. Now, what are the facts as to grain?

Statistics issued by the Prohibition Bureau showed that in 1917, which was before prohibition, the 1,217 brewing plants consumed 3,924,585,831 pounds of grain and other farm products. In 1929, or 12 years later, the 303 cereal-beverage plants consumed 162,000,000 pounds of farm products, or about 4 per cent of the quantity used before prohibition. Prohibition of beer, therefore, deprived the American farmer of 3,761,895,269 pounds of farm products, of which barley was the largest item. This amounts to 80,000,000 bushels, in round numbers, of grain annually. Putting it another way, allowing 1,000 bushels per grower, it would require 80,000 growers to produce the grain used by brewers prior to prohibition. The barley grower went to wheat, with the result of further increasing the surplus of this commodity. In 1917 farmers received $2.05; in 1918, $2.06; in 1919, $2.18. In 1921 after a year of prohibition they received $1.04, while to-day it ranges all the way from 10 to 30 cents, according to location and distance from market.

Let us touch the question from an unemployment standpoint. The relegalization of beer would provide employment for 1,250,000 persons in the brewing and dependent industries. The Federal Government is faced to-day with a Treasury deficit of a billion dollars. Until 1914 beer was taxed at $1 per barrel and in 1919 was increased to $6 per barrel which, on a production of 66,000,000 barrels, brought in a revenue of almost $400,000,000 annually.

We have had 13 years of prohibition, with the resulting loss of governmental revenue of $5,200,000,000, which is based on a then-existing population of 100,000,000 people. It is, therefore, safe to say that the Government has lost revenue in beer alone of more than $7,000,000,000 under our present population. Then add to this the crime-cost burden and the figures would easily reach the stupendous sum of $20,000,000,000. In addition to an era of lawlessness and flouting of law we have an economic situation that almost amounts to stagnation. The reopening of breweries, many of which are in a state of delapidation, would set a new industry to work that would absorb 1,250,000 workers, consume 10 per cent of our surplus grain, and result in economic benefits to more than a hundred separate industries.

Let us bring the subject to our own State of Oregon. The hop crop has been one of our most important agricultural products. Before prohibition we produced as high as 165,000 bales, or the equivalent of 33,000,000 pounds. To-day we produce about 13,000,000 pounds. But even with this reduced production it employs over 50,000 people to harvest the hopes alone, and spends in excess of $650,000 in a period of little more than two weeks—a tidy sum in these days of distress. An additional sum of $900,000 is expended for general production of the crop—insurance, burlap, twine, etc. The price of hops during the past few years has ruled around the cost of production, but with legalized malt beer, increase in acreage would become necessary to balance consumption. But in the meantime the market value of the crop would greatly enhance in value. With the opening of breweries every bale of unsold hops of all ages would be required, and we would go into the coming season with an empty storehouse. The existing acreage in Oregon alone is capable of producing 20,000,000 pounds. It is not unreasonable to anticipate a 50-cent market or a $10,000,000 hop crop in the Willamette Valley.

Visualize the effect of $10,000,000 spread through 10 counties in the valley. It would require $2,500,000 alone to produce the crop, the bulk of which would pass into the pockets of the needy class of people. This would leave $7,500,000 for the grower to expend. It would enable him to pay his back taxes, lift his mortgages, liquidate his obligations to the banks and merchants and bring about an era of prosperity. Another important feature which must not be overlooked is the fact that 98 per cent of all our hops are sold without the State and not within the State; in other words, this vast sum of money would come from the brewers in New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, Maryland, Massachusetts, and other large consuming centers, and from London, where a part of our hops are annually marketed and for which there is a demand on account of their high quality.

There is an abundance of additional data available for your committee which the trade can and is ready to furnish, but sufficient information is furnished in this brief in the support of the contemplated legislation. The regulatory and revenue features of the bill under consideration may require some changes, but on the whole appears to be satisfactory. I understand that many of its features have been taken from the Quebec law, which to-day is recognized as a model of its kind. No perfect law on this or any other subject can be drawn, but after a fair trial its strength and weakness will soon manifest itself.

ADDRESS BY ARTHUR KROCK ON WORK OF WASHINGTON NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very learned and enlightening speech delivered by the distinguished editor, Arthur Krock, at the luncheon of the Columbia Alumni Federation on February 13, 1933.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Butler, members of the Columbia alumni, and guests, my pleasure in being asked to participate in the program of such an occasion is, I admit, tinged with surprise that a newspaper man of my classification should be asked to speak. Primarily, the function of the Washington correspondent is to sift information from the heap of governmental activity and present it to the readers of his newspaper without comment. Under the personal responsibility fixed by his signature over his articles he may analyze and interpret the news and reveal the atmosphere in which it is made without committing his newspaper to his analysis or interpretation. But that is as far as the correspondent may go and not transgress the implicit contract between the reputable newspaper and its readers. This contract is that nothing shall be found in the news columns which, even by the subtle methods known to experienced journalists, misrepresents an opinion as a fact. If the correspondent expresses opinions, they must be the opinions of others. And if he inserts his own opinion under the representation tnat it is the view of the community which the article concerns, he has forsaken his pledge and that of his newspaper to its readers.

Because of this severe regulation, the correspondent yields public attention and fame, with their pleasing usufruct, to the signed commentator, the personal editorial writer, and to the editor whose identity becomes generally known. While he digs in the stubborn soil of capitals for his few nuggets of fact, beset by the harshest sort of obstruction and competition, the signed editorial writer and the editor in their peaceful studies await the delivery of these nuggets to the surface, and then leisurely and noncompetitively separate the gold from the dross while thousands cheer. It is notable that the Senate Finance Committee, in seeking the views of those who may know how to save the country, did not ask any correspondent or reporter to come before them. This may serve to explain why I feel especially flattered to-day. I have been both editor and reporter, and I understand their relative status.

You of Columbia and at Columbia are used to the unlimited scope of your sages and seers. Their telescopes survey the world at a glance and sweep easily through the solar system and across the sun. At Washington we sit peering into a microscope. On the narrow field beneath our tiny lens the political infusoria dart about. Our range is so close that frequently, and properly, we are accused of failing to envisage the broad aspects of problems. But on that narrow field are fought and won and lost some of the most important battles of the world. So it is well, perhaps, that we should sit at our microscopes, bringing daily to the Olympians at their telescopes the news of the political conflict.

At the moment, Washington is the troubled Capital of a troubled Nation and a melancholy world. The fault, I think, is not lack of capacity or good faith on the part of legislators and members of the administration. Under the workings of our political system those responsible for government had half their power shorn in the elections of 1930, when the House became Democratic, and the rest of it was taken by the voters in 1932 when the Senate and the Presidency were also put into the hands of the other party. Since 1930 there has been a partial interregnum, punctuated by an occasional enactment forced by the economic crisis. Since last November the interregnum has become complete, and neither party, the President, nor the President elect is responsible for it.

It was perfectly evident to observers of our system that if the administration and the control of the Senate were changed in the last national elections, the existing situation would result. I think the change was worth the cost. But, whether it was or not, it seems manifestly wise to stop worrying about the lost motion inevitable up to noon on March 4 and to begin concentrating on how best to set the wheels turning again after that date.

The wheels will turn, and will continue to turn, and will manufacture the energy required to pull the world up to the surface again only if Franklin D. Roosevelt makes a success of the Presidency. His failure would produce conditions which would make the last three years seem like the Golden Age. I do not believe that there is serious disagreement in this presence with that view.

But these questions immediately arise after the expression of that opinion:

Has Franklin D. Roosevelt the moral and intellectual qualities plus the will and the spirit to make a success?

How can those within the sound of my voice, in common with American citizens everywhere, help him to that success?

Of the qualifications of the President elect I am confident. He is experienced, earnest, clear in purpose, and possessed of greater public prestige and party strength than any Chief Executive in recent times. But unless he is supported and followed, these qualifications will be insufficient. Opposing him are the personal ambitions of men in office, the natural partisanship of minorities, and a confusion of counsel which must be evident to you in the jangled utterances of your favorite economists and public advisers.

How can you help to level these obstacles? I venture to submit some definite suggestions:

Against the powerful and selfish lobbies which control legislation because they are organized, each community and group should set up public lobbies and be as ruthless as they are. If they threaten Members of Congress in the name of extravagance, why during this emergency should not public groups of greater size threaten them in the name of economy? I should like to see the National Economy League and that veterans' association which opposes the bonus make political organizations as ruthless for the right as these others are ruthless for the wrong. We have enough commissions and committees already. But there is one more which would be worth all the others—a nonpartisan group of national leaders, whose names are known and respected, who will pledge themselves for a year to watch closely what goes on in Washington, and unhesitatingly and publicly denounce, in words which will come to them, all evidences of political sniping or legislative delaying beyond the point where a man has the right to state his opposition.

Behind this national committee should be the body of citizens, emphasizing the denunciation by expressing themselves similarly in the newspapers and in letters to their legislators. You can not possibly realize the effect of a widespread attention to this public duty, usually neglected in the United States.

A real opportunity to apply the birch will come when Mr. Roosevelt, as I feel certain that he will, asks Congress to approve changes in the laws affecting veterans' compensation, changes which will reduce the cost of Government by hundreds of millions. Congress would be glad to give him a grant of power in advance, but it has been objected that this is constitutionally impossible. If that objection holds, he must ask for a specific enactment; and the opposition to it, engendered by fear of the lobbies, will be a powerful adversary even to his prestige and political strength. The moment that this comes, if the American people will make themselves heard, it can be won. If they take out their feelings in talk on the street corners, it may be lost.

There are two other instruments necessary to the new President's success—the party caucus and a liberalization of the Senate rules. However much they may dislike the system, the American people must now stand behind the caucus. If the President can not bind his party to his program in advance so that individual legislators, beset by lobbies, may excuse their vote on the ground of party regularity, essential items in his program must fail. If a few Members of the Senate, even with its large Democratic majority, avail themselves of the powers of delay which are inherent in the rules, these should be tightened beyond the point of the closure regulation which is now so reluctantly applied. Demand closure if there is undue delay, and new rules if that remedy proves insufficient. The Senate will hear and heed the demand if it comes from the mass of the citizens.

When Congress is given an unmistakable impression of the people's will, it usually responds. Much of its weakness arises from the fact that on controversial or emergent issues the public permits itself to be split up by propaganda or sentimental emotion, while the lobbies stand solid and firm.

I realize that I am speaking to this group as if it were the whole American people. But it is an influential and representative group, and, multiplied as it can be, determined as it should be, with telegraph wires, the mails, and the newspapers wide open to its views, it can enable Franklin D. Roosevelt to effect his program. Whatever that program is, we must support it in its essentials. There is no other pathway to recovery. Every other direction is down.

ADDRESS BY DR. GEORGE W. TRUETT ON "LIQUOR AND ITS CURE"

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I submit for publication in the RECORD an address on Liquor and Its Cure by Dr. George W. Truett, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Dallas, Tex., at the state-wide convention of dry forces at Dallas, Tex., January 2, 1933.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and all you, my friends and fellow temperance workers, as a citizen of Dallas, I join with my good neighbor, Dr. W. C. Martin, pastor of this great church, in a most cordial welcome to this group who have come to take counsel with each other regarding this great temperance cause. From El Paso to Texarkana, from Brownsville to Denison, from Beaumont to Amarillo, this whole great State is well represented in this conference to-night. I would take a moment also to felicitate the State of Texas that these great leaders, Dr. C. C. Selecman, of Southern Methodist University, as our president; Dr. W. R. White, of Fort Worth, our executive secretary; and that stalwart Christian business man, Arthur A. Everts, our treasurer; Bishops John M. Moore and H. A. Boaz, of the Methodist Church; and many others of like prominence are willing and glad to give their time and energies as leaders in this great cause. Likewise we rejoice that so many of our pastors and educators, doing their noble work in their several fields, are showing their warm sympathy with this movement, so that our hearts are stirred indeed by such a mobilization of strength from all over Texas.

We are of one mind that we are facing one of the most responsible hours ever faced in the life of our country. For more than a hundred years the moral forces of our Nation have been working for temperance and good government. Some of the most vital chapters in our national life have been written in connection with the effort to have a sober, thinking nation, and the highest expression of civilization and government. The eighteenth amendment has been written into the Constitution of the United States. The finest sentiment is behind such enactment by our people. We want to remind ourselves that 9 States were already dry, and that in 1914, 23 more wheeled into the dry column, making a total of 32, before the eighteenth amendment was passed. Then the eighteenth amendment was written into our Constitution, the greatest gift of the Nation to the home, and the greatest contribution to our self-government yet made. Soon the 46 States through their legislatures gave full approval to the enactment of this amendment. It has been written into the Constitution of the United States with the greatest backing ever given any Federal law in the life of this country. You want to remember that, for you hear in many directions how that amendment was foisted on the life of the people. Thoughtfully, carefully, prayerfully it was written, and in the same manner adopted.

But now conditions have arisen that compel a reopening of this whole question. Two great parties have made decisions that force us to a reexamination and a reagitation of the matters we thought settled. This is a moral question, and the moral forces of the Nation can not, dare not, and will not be silent about it. If you think the preachers are going to be silent about this principle, that goes to the foundation of the home and the social, moral, religious, and economic life of our people, then you have misread the spirit and the temper of the preachers of the United States. They will not be silent, they can not be silent, when the very stones of the street cry out for action and for leadership. The whole question is now before us for reexamination and reagitation, and in every city, in every town, in every village, and in the farthest country places, we must bring it before the different estates of our people for their renewed judgment in this great cause. The issue must go back to the tribunal of our people, the message carried by every pulpit and every religious and moral leader in the community, whether in one party or another. If the matter were political, this group would not be here at all. The question is bigger and deeper and broader than that. Our Government is involved, the business of the country is involved, the home is involved, the religion of Christ is involved, the little children and the helpless women are involved, and no true prophet of God in this whole land is being silent to-day. We certify all the estates of our people that this question is now going to have the attention of this Nation wherever we can command that attention. The preachers must speak the truth faithfully and in the right spirit. We have a great message and a great mission; we must now declare that message and fulfill that mission. The awful responsibility of this task is in our hands, and we must not fail.

The press also will help in this fight. I join with Bishop Moore in gratitude that in Dallas our four papers speak earnestly on this subject, and in a way to cheer our hearts. The secular press is needed in this great battle, and we are happy to find that some of our papers are writing some of the most wholesome editorials on which our eyes have fallen. How powerful is the press of our land and how great is its responsibility! It can betray and desert a great democracy or it can sound such clarion notes that that democracy may be safe in time of storm, with its feet placed on a high mountain. We will call the press to our aid in this great struggle.

The laity, of course—those noble laymen of every group who are everywhere the bulwark of the social order where it is built on the right foundation—must stand together with us in this crusade. The fine lawyers, the fine educators, the fine business men, other fine professional leaders, the fine physicians—what would we do without the medical profession's clear-voiced stand on prohibition? Every great medical society over the country has taken its stand in favor of prohibition. Many individual professional men have passed on this question in a great way. I have here a report on the Dangers of Moderate Drinking, by Richard Cabot, for many years chief of staff of the Massachusetts General Hospital and professor of medicine in Harvard University. Hear what he says:

"Forty years ago I was almost as ignorant about alcohol as most wets appear to be to-day. I supposed it would stimulate the circulation and the brain, and so help to pull a man through pneumonia or typhoid. It took years of watching its effects in those and other germ diseases to teach me, as experience has now taught almost all intelligent physicians, that alcohol does harm and not good in infectious diseases. Forty years ago almost all the physicians at the Massachusetts General Hospital believed that alcohol stimulated the heart and the powers of resistance in fevers. Now I don't know one who believes that. The medical use of alcohol as a stimulant has been given up in the better hospitals because to-day we know that it is not a stimulant, but a narcotic. We used to think that moderate drinking—'temperance,' as the wets call it—did no harm. Now we know it is responsible for our enormous loss of life through automobile accidents on our streets. One cocktail is enough to impair the dexterity and quickness of hand and foot, to spoil the man's judgment about speeds and distance, on which safe driving depends. Most of the drunken drivers arrested every week on our streets are not drunk in the ordinary sense. They can walk and talk well enough; they have imbibed only a moderate amount of liquor. They are temperate drinkers, but they are the most dangerous of all drinkers in this fast-moving age. The man who is really drunk, the excessive drinker, rarely tries to drive a motor car. It is the moderate drinkers who do most harm. They killed in 1931 more people in the United States than typhoid fever, diphtheria, and influenza put together.

"The effects of alcohol in killing people when much of it is taken within a short time, are usually laid to 'bad liquor.' This is very rarely proved. Almost all deaths from drinking are due to too much 'good liquor.'

"Prohibition has not stopped 'moderate drinking' on the part of many persons. Hence we have still to fight the enormous evils of 'temperance' and 'moderation.' The evidence of excessive drinking shown in cirrhosis of the liver and the alcoholic insanity following repeated attacks of delirium tremens are also with us, but have decreased since prohibition, even when enforced as little as the wets permit us now to enforce it.

"The wets complain of bootlegging, of riches and power in the hands of criminals, of the bribing of officials and the corruption of those who ought to enforce the law. But who corrupts them? Who gives the criminals power to corrupt them? Of course, it's the wets. They shoot holes in prohibition, and then complain that it isn't bullet-proof. They pay bootleggers to bribe policemen and then they complain that there is much corruption in the business.

"Surely this is a new trick in the public discussion of a serious matter. I never knew people themselves to cause an evil with their own hands, their own money, their own throats, and then go on the stump and complain of it. I never knew a man to pull up a railroad track, burn the ties, and twist the rails, and then complain because his train wouldn't run smoothly over the tracks. I never knew a man to pour water on all fires in his house and then complain 'that they had all gone out.' I never knew a citizen to bribe a policeman to stay off his beat, and then complain that the policeman was not on it.

"That's the wet side of this case, and the only argument they have got is that things are just as bad as they have made them. Poor wets! Their logic is almost as bad as their habits!"

This is not a preacher, friends, it's an honored professor of Harvard University, a staff member of the Massachusetts General Hospital. And he is not alone. Business men like Ford, economists like Fisher, of Yale, join us in the statement that this movement should have the support of every man and woman who loves humanity throughout this great country.

And the women—that mighty group! Whose heart does not stir when good women come to the side of a great cause! Mrs. Henry Peabody told the Congressmen: "Ten millions of the women of America are now enlisted by name in the battle to keep this country dry. Gentlemen, you will have a lively race to get beyond those women, who are highly resolved that the eighteenth amendment shall not be repealed."

Then the young people, led by such stalwarts as T. C. Gardner, when they hear of this high cause of prohibition, when they are informed as we mean to inform them, they will enlist in myriads under the temperance banner. Young men have won the day in the early American colonies; in the great days of Texas independence; in the French Revolution; at Marathon and Thermopylæ. In the World War, the greatest holocaust the world has ever known, again it was the young men who won the day; and the young men, fortified and encouraged by the young women, are coming to enlist in this war by the millions; the young people of America are going to be mobilized to take care of this great job.

What is to be our argument? Not invective and denunciation. Not that. When the saloons were in this city years ago I had contacts with the men who ran them. I buried their dead. I sat with them in sorrow. I have gone to their homes after a child had gone, or perhaps a loved wife and mother; and I have said to those men, "Because I am your friend and the friend of your family I am against your business world without end, because it is wrong." We are sure of the righteousness of our cause. How shall we press it? Not with sarcasm and invective and ridicule. Not with playing politics. This question goes to the very foundation of our social order, and every right-thinking person is pledged to give us hearty cooperation. Let us go out now in this great cause and teach all the estates of our people what is involved. Teach them—tell them—show them.

To-day the people perish from lack of knowledge. It is 15 years since the amendment was voted. A new generation has come which does not know the things we know about the earlier day. It is not enough to tell them that if the eighteenth amendment is repealed we will have the saloons back again. Teach the young people about the saloons. Tell them that women hated to pass those corners, particularly after the dark had come, because men reeled from those swinging doors stumbling and vomiting and swearing. If you had a woman with you, you walked fast to get by those places—and those places were everywhere. I agree with Bishop Moore that I used to see more drunken men in one Saturday night than I have seen for the last 10 years. Teach the young people about the saloon. Tell them that it was a cesspool in foul things; that in its shelter nestled the gambling house and that den of iniquity, the brothel, where women sold their bodies for money. The youth doesn't want that back again any more than we do, and they with us will dedicate their lives to the statement that it shall not come back. This is our great task—to go out and tell the young people. The saloon was the enemy of the Nation. It was the enemy of our bodies, for eyes were bleared and hands were trembling; it was the enemy of our minds, for clear thinking and high purpose were impossible under its rule; it was the enemy of the souls of men and the power of God, and it was declared in the Good Book that no drunkard shall enter the kingdom of God; so it is written, "Cursed be he that putteth the wine cup to his brother's lips, for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder."

All these things we will tell our young people. All the estates of our people will be advised again concerning them. We used to know these things. It used to be that never a week went by that we did not hear them from our mothers or from the pulpit or from one of the temperance bands; that drink was the enemy of mankind, the source of poverty and pain, was brought home to us earnestly and often. It is still the great enemy, the enemy of decent civil government, the Gibraltar of bad politics in America. It is political harlotry for the State to go into the business of legalizing the liquor traffic. We are going to tell the young people that we are turning back to black savagery, if we allow liquor back in this country. We will find the conscience of our people, because we have a conscience that can not be stilled. Paul, the greatest apostle, was grandest of all when he said, "Herein do I exercise myself, to have a conscience void of offense toward God and man." We are banded together in the great bundle of life. No man liveth to himself or dieth to himself. Lady Macbeth may wring her white hands and say she did not murder Duncan, yet is she guilty of blackest murder because she cheered on the man who put the dagger to his heart. If we are silent when it is planned to turn that black tide of ruin upon our country, then you and I are particeps criminis in this great crime.

We will certify to the American people all these facts. We will not be silent. Too much is at stake. "I am debtor to Jew and Greek * * * to all men." We are debtor to all men to-day, and to those coming after us. Here is a great moral question, going to the very taproot of our national life, and we must deal with it. To get our tax money out of legalized liquor is one of the most incongruous things one could possibly dream about. Imagine taxing crime and ruin to get money to run our schools and hospitals! Taxing iniquity to run our State is a crime against humanity. Such a moral wrong never could be right. To take such money to run our social institutions is one of the most impossible things in the history of civilization. Tax money. Revenue. There are some things right-minded men and women must not dare to consider. We are to make the people see that. Into every schoolhouse, every hamlet, every wayside place we must take the message, and my humble judgment and deep conviction is that when the people see it clearly they will say, "The eighteenth amendment must be maintained." It will be treason to nullify the efforts they have made for years to make and keep this a sober Nation in the sight of God.

This is an hour of rededication to a great purpose. The gauntlet has been thrown with a sort of gay defiance. We will take it up, and we will never drop the fight until it is written in the annals once and for all that there shall be no legalized liquor in our country. This is a great hour we are facing, and we face it with courage. We are of one mind—that there has been a slump in moral ideals since the war to the last degree regrettable. We have slept while the enemy sowed tares in our fertile fields, but the children must come back and get the right education on this matter. Homes, as the great educators, must come back and challenge the power of the liquor traffic; and under the directed power that flows in this week from one end of the country to the other we must speak our will to our legislative bodies. And remember that back of every political group is God. "Ride on, O King Eternal." Every man and woman who hears me to-night will go out to say, "Because we care for the highest welfare of mankind—too much is at stake; we can not be silent; we tell you what this thing means to you and to those who come after you, and we ask God to bring it close home to you." If we do this worthily, earnestly, persistently, prayerfully, there is one sure outcome.

"Our fathers to their graves have gone;
Their strife is past—their triumph won;
But sterner trials wait the race
Which rises in their honored place—
A moral warfare with the crime
And folly of an evil time.

"So let it be. In God's own might
We gird us for the coming fight,
And strong in Him whose cause is ours
In conflict with unholy powers,
We grasp the weapons He has given,
The light, the truth, and love of Heaven."

O God, lead us on!

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate carry out the unanimous-consent agreement and adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 18, 1933, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet and let us be conscious of Thy holy presence. With gratitude we approach Thee. Make us altogether worthy of our high calling and touch our hearts by the breath of our Heavenly Father. As servants of the people, may we be prophets and ministers of a better day dawn. Thou who art the bread of life strengthen us in that faith that maketh not ashamed and that sees the sun behind the floating cloud. We pray, blessed Lord, for the might of that faith that rebukes selfishness and greed and that lays hold of the altar of God. We thank Thee for the Teacher of Samaria, whose beatitudes are His portrait, whose life is the light of men, and who still walks the waves of this turbulent world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 14363. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 211. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 42) entitled "Concurrent resolution to compile, print, and bind the proceedings of Congress in connection with the exercises in memory of the late President Calvin Coolidge."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 362

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. GODFREY G. GOODWIN, late a Representative from the State of Minnesota.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now take a recess until 12 o'clock m. to-morrow.

The message also announced that pursuant to the foregoing resolutions the Vice President had appointed Mr. SHIPSTEAD and Mr. SCHALL members of the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KLEBERG, for two days, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the order of the House, the Chair declares the House to be in recess.

Accordingly the House stood in recess, to meet at the call of the Speaker.

MEMORIAL SERVICES

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives presided.

The Chaplain, Doctor Montgomery:

Almighty God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires are known, and from whom no secrets are hid, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit, that we may perfectly love Thee and worthily magnify Thy holy name. Amen.

The double quartet sang "Lamp in the West."

The Chaplain, Doctor Montgomery:

Let not your heart be troubled; believe in God; believe also in Me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you, for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto Myself, that where I am there ye may be also.

Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?

*And He showed me a pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river was there the tree of life; * * * and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.*

And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light; and they shall reign for ever and ever.

Serene, I fold my hands and wait,
Nor care for wind, or tide, or sea.
I rave no more 'gainst time or fate,
For, lo! my own shall come to me.

I stay my haste, I make delays,
For what avails this eager pace?
I stand amid the eternal ways,
And what is mine shall know my face.

Asleep, awake, by night or day,
The friends I seek are seeking me;
No wind can drive my bark astray,
Nor change the tide of destiny.

What matter if I stand alone?
I wait with joy the coming years.
My heart shall reap where it has sown,
And garner up its fruit of tears.

* * * * * * *

The stars come nightly to the skies;
The tidal wave unto the sea;
Nor time, nor space, nor deep, nor high,
Can keep my own away from me.

---

So I stand by my cross on the lone mountain crest,
Looking toward the ultimate sea.
In the gloom of the mountain a ship lies at rest,
And one sails away from the lea.
One spreads its white sails on a far-reaching track,
With pennant and sheet flowing free.
One lies in the shadow with sails laid back,
The ship that is waiting for me.
For lo, in the distance the clouds break away,
The gate's flowing portals I see.
And I hear from the outgoing ship in the bay
A song of the sailors in glee.
So I wait for my ship to go to the shore,
In the ship that is waiting for me.

Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

Elected to the Sixty-ninth and succeeding Congresses. Died February 16, 1933.

Mrs. NORTON, a Representative from the State of New Jersey, standing in front of the Speaker's rostrum, placed a memorial rose in a vase as the name of each deceased Member was read by the Clerk.

Then followed one minute of devotional silence.

Vera Ross sang "God Shall Wipe Away All Tears."

Hon. JOHN W. MCCORMACK, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN W. M'CORMACK, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in one of the most trying periods of our peace-time history we pause to pay tribute to our honored departed whose names have just been read. It is fitting and proper that we should render this official and personal tribute of honor and respect.

We meet to-day not only to pay reverence to their memory but to consecrate ourselves to the cause of liberty, of justice, of progress, and of independence which they so faithfully served. It therefore follows that this is a day not only of commemoration but of dedication.

As one who believes "that death is but the beginning and not the end," I can see our departed friends in "that beautiful land on high" speaking to us from "beyond the Great Divide."

He who liveth and believeth in Me liveth forever.

Since the memorial exercises of last year two Senators and nine Representatives in the Congress of the United States have received their last earthly summons. This occasion of necessity calls for a composite and not an individual eulogy.

When the roll was called we heard the names of departed colleagues, every one of whom in lifetime stood for the best traditions and loftiest ideals humanly attainable. Each and every one of them knew the spirit of the founders as expressed in the Constitution—knew the soul of the Nation—and that spirit became theirs. Each one of them had a profound knowledge of our country's history; the general and permanent interest and welfare of the United States was sacred to them, and they promoted and defended that interest without flinching and without fear. They gave to life and to their Government the best that was in them. Fitted by tradition, learning, and training, they rendered the high character of public service which entitled them to say at the end of life's journey, in the words of John Quincy Adams:

I have the approbation of my own conscience.

They were not of the school who believed that the world owed them a living but of the school who gave freely and voluntarily of their great abilities that mankind might progress and that Government might be improved upon for the benefit of their generation and of generations to come.

The contributions of past generations of Americans to the establishment and progress of our Government, with their unwritten mandate to preserve and improve upon for the benefit of the next generation, was assumed and fulfilled by our friends who are watching and listening from beyond. They loved their country and had an abiding faith in its people, its institutions, and its future—a lesson to many Americans of to-day.

The thought entered my mind as the roll was called that collectively they constitute as fine a group of outstanding Americans for whom memorial exercises ever have been held. They did not believe that mere material development was the only or highest goal; they knew and exemplified during their lives that the true greatness of a nation was moral and intellectual, the upbuilding of character and intelligence, the preservation and the sanctity of the family life, and the recognition of the omnipotence of the Master of the universe.

Not only were they men possessed of profound knowledge and experience, and knowledge is power, but they knew the rocks on which nations have been shattered, and steered their course far away.

What greater ambition can one possess than to strive to do their best, spiritually and materially, for their fellow men; to reduce the sum of human misery; to help those less fortunate than themselves; and to preserve for future generations the constructive efforts and contributions of the generations of the past? Such were the thoughts entertained and practiced by our departed friends, thoughts and purposes which are commendable to every true American of to-day.

As the late Henry Cabot Lodge once said:

> Whatever our faith, whatever our belief in progress, there can be no nobler purposes for man than thus to deal with the only earth he knows and the fragment of time awarded him for his existence here.

Or, in the words of the poet:

> His gentleness, his tenderness, his fair courtesy,
> Were like a ring of virtues 'bout him set,
> And Godlike charity, the center where all met.

They underwent experiences common to mankind, with the joys and sorrows of life. The character and reputation that they established, together with their ability, attracted the attention of their people who sent them to powerful and honorable positions in the Congress of the United States, to contribute toward the solving of the affairs of the Nation. Wise in counsel, sound in judgment, and by reason of their capacity and ability they served on important and powerful committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and died while rendering such service to the country and their people. They lived during the time allotted to them by God, and when the summons came they left behind nothing but praise, and they had before them the certainty of reward. During their years of public service they had witnessed and encountered violent political and industrial changes, shaking the purpose of the weak and vacillating; yet, in victory or defeat, in prosperity or adversity, they stood the same courageous representatives of the people, never compromising with error nor surrendering to expediency.

> He never sold the truth to serve the hour,
> Or palter'd with eternal God for power.

As we view their unsullied and noble purposes, as we view them as we knew them, our reverence and admiration alike grow even stronger. We turn to them in gratitude, and we commend what they did and their examples to those who come after us.

These men represented the cross current of American life. The roll shows that the United States Senators represented the sovereign States of Colorado and Washington and the Representatives districts in the sovereign States of Tennessee, Virginia, Maryland, Illinois, Michigan, Texas, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Minnesota—North, East, South, and West.

They did not represent alone the district or State or the section of the country from which they came; they did not consider legislation from the local or sectional viewpoint, but approached the determination of all problems from a broad, national basis. "We are one people; we have one destiny; we must rise or fall together."

Such a feeling is the courageous spirit of all persons who comprehend the true, broad-minded, patriotic functions of a citizen, and particularly those in public or official life, irrespective of the office or position they occupy.

The great lesson we can learn from the lives of our late colleagues is a constant devotion to our country and its institutions; that we must love and defend our country for our country's sake. Their intense Americanism must always encourage us, and we must faithfully and courageously discharge the duties which devolve upon us in whatever station or sphere of life we may be placed.

The Congress of the United States is the outstanding legislative body of the world. Its Members legislate for the most powerful nation that has existed in the history of time. Its Members, under normal conditions, have important duties to perform. In abnormal times, such as we are confronted with to-day, the responsibility is so great that at times one has a feeling of helplessness. New and unexpected questions, which I will not specifically mention, have recently arisen and will continue to arise. We are all conscious of our responsibility. We are seeking that sense of direction and skill to carry to a fulfillment a policy of practical emancipation from economic disturbances. We are all seeking to preserve the fundamentals and improve upon the structure of government.

As, in the concluding words of Woodrow Wilson, in his first inaugural:

> We know our task to be no mere task of politics, but a task which shall search us through and through.

And, as our departed friends look down upon us, I can see their smiles of confidence in our ability and our courage to meet the present situation, to determine our problems, and to be recorded by the historians of to-morrow as a generation "who kept the faith." "An invulnerable state of states, an undefeatable country of countries, an indestructible nation of nations!"

Our heritage to preserve and transmit to generations yet unborn.

Mrs. Edgar T. Paul sang "These Are They."

Hon. FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT, a Representative from the State of New York, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. FREDERICK M. DAVENPORT

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, we do well to pay affectionate tribute to those of our colleagues who during the past year have entered upon the great adventure which we call death, an adventure which all would escape but which no one does escape. Death is the most startling and dramatic event in life, and to the end of the world friends of the fallen will gather to reflect upon their virtues, to ponder upon the meaning of death, upon the lessons of forbearance and humility one toward another which it enforces, and to renew the human sympathy and understanding which fail us often in the midst of the conflicting and competitive affairs of our everyday lives.

These colleagues who have left us were from the East and from the West, from the North and from the South. Yet they wrought for a common purpose within these Halls. When death comes and history gets a hearing, sections of our common country mean less than nothing at all. The most tragic cleavage that America ever experienced came in the years preceding and embracing and following the Civil War. Yet in the perspective of history the two greatest figures to emerge from that war are Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee. Conflicting opinions and partisan passions and sectional strife can not live in the presence of death and character. Death teaches unity and tolerance and peace. In the range of the years nothing counts but character. These colleagues of ours were men of character and patriotic purpose who died in the service of their country.

Of recent years there has been much comment upon the heavy mortality in the membership of the Congress of the United States. So far as I know there has never been any attempt to compare it with the general mortality of the same age periods within the population. Such comparison might mean little, inasmuch as the membership of the Congress is a grouping of its own kind. There is usually some particular substantial physical and mental reason for the men and women who are here. At least, nearly all who achieve election to this House are not here by chance.

There are certain periods—after a great war, for example—when young men of reputation rapidly win their way in public affairs. But usually it is through physical and mental stress and strain that one has battled his way through the years to this eminence—often to the more or less unconscious neglect of his natural well-being. Every campaign thereafter is likely to be, and in most cases is, a gruelling struggle against difficult opposition. A seat in the Congress is a coveted prize in every community in the United States. The ambition for personal preferment, the ambition to be close to the sources of power in the country, the ambition to serve well the age in which he lives, all contribute to the highly competitive conflict which an aspirant for a seat in this Congress usually finds himself in the midst of. And there is no release from strain when he arrives. The complexity of the problems he has to face, the gravity of the decisions which he is called upon to make, the frequent pressure of selfish group interests upon his spirit, the burden of the human contacts with a quarter to a half million people in his constituency, easily undermine his vital resistance, if he is not intelligently careful. The human relation of a genuine representative with hundreds of his constituents is as intimate as that of the doctor, the lawyer, the priest, or the minister. Continuity of rest may become as impossible as continuity of work upon the real task of legislation. It is not surprising if some hitherto unsuspected physical defect appears and assumes the proportions of a physical catastrophe.

The life of a conscientious Member of Congress is a life of exacting service to a degree which is totally unappreciated by large numbers of the population in the times in which we live. There is no more dangerous symptom in the American democracy than the tendency on every hand to point the finger of scorn at the Congress of the United States. I do not say that the Congress is without blame. We are capable of doing foolish things. We are temporarily swept by selfishness and personal fears and political moods, but I have never ceased to declare, since I came to know this House, that on fundamental questions of right or wrong for America, if you give this House time and give it the facts, there is no power on earth that can buy it or cajole it or deceive it.

It is a true cross section of the American people. Its very faults and blunderings are the faults and blunderings of the American people. Its aspirations and ideals, its yearnings for a better economic and social order are the yearnings, the aspirations, and the ideals of the American people. And if American democracy is to survive, this conception of their parliamentary representatives must speedily be adopted by the American people, and the Congress of the United States must not fail to fulfill the promise of the new faith.

It is a dangerous time. We still have widely heterogeneous elements in our population, diverse sectional backgrounds and interests, a group of economic and social problems more intricate than any that have heretofore troubled America. Popular government was never so hard to manage nor in greater peril.

The American people have elected 435 men and women to this House, most of them trained in the school of practical reality, to face this time in which we live and, so far as government can do it, to point the way out of the morass into which the world has fallen, to do battle with the forces of disintegration which have attacked us, and to shape the destiny of 120,000,000 people. In this crisis the American people ought to give to their Representatives the same backing that they would give their armies in war. Next to enlisting in war, the American people, their humorists, their editors, their critics, ought to teach the young men and women of the present generation that there is nothing more difficult nor more important than enlisting and fighting in the public service.

If the sentiment of millions at home is hostile to the army the army must collapse. Thus the Russian Army collapsed in the World War. If the sentiment of the people at home is hostile to their public servants, consciously or unconsciously, their public servants can not do their best. If the American people expected more from the Congress of the United States, they would receive more. We reap what we sow. If we sow, in our press, in our daily conversation, in our public thought, distrust and disdain of our public servants, we reap what we sow. As I see it, the Congress of the United States is tremendously handicapped at the present hour by the lack of inspiration that the confidence of a good expectancy on the part of the country would give them to do their best. If America is to remain America, if parliamentary government is to survive among us, a balanced cooperation between public opinion and the constitutional representatives of the people can not too soon be restored.

These men who are gone were Members of this elect company of Representatives of the common weal. They met the tests of their high office courageously and intelligently. But they are gone. And everyone who goes from us is dear to some one who is left behind—dear to families and friends who are here to-day.

We are forever pausing in memorial gatherings like this to ponder anew the tragic termination of life and the prospect of continuing existence and reunion. In such matters our reflection is not theological nor creedal nor denominational. It is human and what we call religious. Centuries have come and gone since this country was settled and nearly 150 years since the Nation was founded. Religion, as we call it, has been subjected to deep and powerful criticism. Some have rejected it, but not many. Each new generation has had to face the same life experiences of suffering and sorrow which have driven human beings since the primitive days toward eternal hope. Not all the governmental authority of any nation on earth can drive this hope out of the heart of man. Americans, like other people, are as instinctively religious to-day as they ever have been. Each new disclosure of science reveals more clearly a universe of purpose, into the very physics and chemistry of which is wrought the mathematical exactness of an infinite intelligence. The theory of a blind, mechanical materialism, driven by fate, comports no more reasonably than it ever did with the human development of love and sacrifice in the free soul of a mother. In spite of the vast modern advance in science, there is still no reason why the same power which produced the marvelous mystery of energy in the human frame and fitted into it the human spirit, may not also be true to the yearnings and the aspirations of the creature He has made, and in His own time and place, bring together again these dynamic centers of personality and energy into what we call immortality. There is still room for the simple faith of the race that the tangled threads of this life are all the time being woven into the tapestry of eternal justice. It is in this faith to-day that we bid our comrades hail and farewell.

It is for us to snatch the torches falling from their grasp and bear them on through the darkness of the present hour. In these days of bewilderment and despair for so many millions of our countrymen, it is for us to hold unflinchingly to the faith of our fathers, to support by deed and word a popular confidence in the institutions and ideals which have made America.

Say not the struggle naught availeth,
The labor and the wounds are vain,
The enemy faints not nor faileth,
And as things have been they remain.

If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars;
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers,
And, but for you, possess the field.

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent flooding in, the main.

And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light,
In front, the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look, the land is bright.

Mr. Edwin C. Steffe sang Hosanna.

John J. Kahler, staff sergeant, United States Army Band, rendered as a cornet solo Abide With Me.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following benediction:

And now under Thee who is able to keep you from falling and present you before the presence of Throne; unto Him be glory and honor, dominion and power, both now and ever.

And now may grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, abide with us and keep us always. Amen.

CHARLES W. WATERMAN

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, when CHARLES W. WATERMAN passed away on August 27, 1932, Colorado lost its seventeenth United States Senator, and one who had worthily followed a line of illustrious men whose names are still remembered for their able endeavors in the upbuilding not merely of the State of Colorado but of the entire Rocky Mountain region.

Senator WATERMAN was born in a Vermont village on November 2, 1861; before school days came he was crippled, and for seven years he hobbled to the little country school on crutches. Diligently pursuing his steadfast purpose to obtain an education, he overcame the difficulties caused by his frail body, and in 1885 graduated from the University of Vermont with the degree of bachelor of arts. In 1922 he was honored by his alma mater with the degree of doctor of laws. His high esteem for that university was recognized in his will by a substantial endowment. It was not until 1889 that he completed the law course of the University of Michigan, from which he graduated with the degree of bachelor of laws, and was admitted to the bar of the State of Colorado at Denver the same year. The following summer, on June 18, 1890, he married Anna R. Cook of Burlington, Vt., who throughout all the struggles of his life was ever an inspiration to his success.

When first he practiced law in Denver it was in the office of John F. Shafroth, who in later years was Governor of the State of Colorado for two terms, the sixth United States Representative for the first district of Colorado for almost 10 years, and the twelfth United States Senator for one term of six years. As a young lawyer Senator WATERMAN'S ability soon attracted attention, and one day he was invited to become an assistant in the office of Wolcott & Vaile, of which firm the senior member, Edward O. Wolcott, was Colorado's seventh United States Senator, who served two full terms, covering a period of 12 of the most eventful years of the State's history.

After Senator Wolcott's death in 1905, Senator WATERMAN became a member of the firm of Wolcott, Vaile & Waterman and continued in that partnership until 1908. With such continual association with men devoting their best talents to the public welfare, covering a period of almost 20 years, it is little wonder that Senator WATERMAN aspired to also devote a part of his career to the welfare of his country, and to serve the people of his adopted State in the United States Senate and participate in the councils of the Nation.

It is not my purpose to detail his advancement in the practice of his chosen profession, but merely to mention his selection from time to time during the 34 years of his active practice by some of the greatest business men of the State and Nation as their legal counselor. His advice to and advocacy of the causes of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad; the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific; the Great Western Railway; and the Great Western Sugar Co., by whom he was retained during the last 15 years of his active practice—from 1908 to 1923—sufficiently characterize him as a man of great legal attainments.

He was a member of the American, Colorado, and Denver Bar Associations for years, and after his retirement from the practice of law in 1923 he devoted months of service to the United States, without compensation, as the general counsel of the Oil Conservation Board, to which post he was appointed by his old friend and brother Vermonter, President Calvin Coolidge. This was the only public office he ever held until his election in the campaign of 1926 as United States Senator.

Upon his arrival in the United States Senate in 1927, Senator WATERMAN was appointed a member of the Committees on Claims, Naval Affairs, Patents, Privileges and Elections, and Judiciary. Later he became chairman of the Committee on Patents.

During his first few months in the Senate he took no part in debate, but was very active in the work of the committees to which he had been assigned, as appears from the number of printed reports on pending bills. It was on February 20, 1928, that he first entered the Senate debate while a bill was being considered concerning the settlement of claims against Germany and disposition of property held by the Alien Property Custodian. His first question went to the heart of the whole matter. He inquired:

If this bill is passed and becomes a law, and the German Government does not pay as we now anticipate, then these American claimants must necessarily be paid out of the Public Treasury of the United States, must they not?

How much discussion we have had during the months succeeding his death of this very question, and all that was thereby so ably suggested by his prophetic vision.

His forceful presentation of the Vare election contest, support of a sufficient sugar tariff, and various matters included in bills to amend the patent and copyright laws in 1929 directed the attention of the Senate to his forensic skill, his precision in argument, and his power in debate.

By his passing Colorado lost one of the stalwart supporters of the State and its industries and the Nation one of its sound counselors and advocates. His life is another story of continued battling toward success and the overcoming of the physical misfortunes which impeded his progress. He was rapidly becoming one of the Senate's most useful Members when in the summer of 1931 his health began to fail, but the record votes of the Senate show how he stood faithful at all times during his long illness until through sheer lack of physical strength he was unable to be present and answer as his name was called.

During his more than 40 years of active life in and for Colorado and its industries Senator WATERMAN made many abiding friendships. His sincerity of purpose was never questioned. His promise could always be relied upon. Once his course was set he was not to be diverted by friend or enemy. He was forceful, courageous, courteous, gracious; and in his passing Colorado has lost one of her most able citizens and builders.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a tribute by Hon. EDWARD P. COSTIGAN, United States Senator from Colorado, as follows:

TRIBUTE BY SENATOR COSTIGAN

CHARLES W. WATERMAN, of Denver, a prominent Member of the United States Senate for the past six years, and a conspicuous and able practitioner at the Colorado bar for more than 40 years, died in the city of Washington in August, 1932, some three months prior to the termination of his first term as a Member of the Senate.

Senator WATERMAN was born in Waitsfield, Vt., where he attended a rural common school and subsequently an academy for about a year. He entered and graduated with an A. B. degree from the University of Vermont, which in 1922 conferred on him the honorary degree of LL. D.

Following his graduation from that university, he taught school for three years in the States of Connecticut and Iowa. In 1889 he graduated with the degree of LL. B. from the University of Michigan. Thereafter he commenced the practice of law in Denver, Colo., and continued in that profession until, and for some time after, his election in 1926 from that State to a six-year term in the United States Senate.

Senator WATERMAN'S career as a Member of the United States Senate was early impeded by ill health, which continued more and more to incapacitate him until the end. Nevertheless he performed his official duties with noteworthy care and fine courage until shortly before the close of his last session of Congress. Perhaps his most striking contribution to Senate debates was during the discussions of the tariff bill which finally became the tariff act of 1930. On one occasion he delivered a detailed argument in support of the confirmation of the nomination, which the Senate ultimately rejected, of Judge Parker to membership in the United States Supreme Court.

Because of his physical disabilities, Senator WATERMAN in the spring of 1932 announced that he would not seek reelection.

Tributes to Senator WATERMAN'S life and character will undoubtedly be paid at the approaching annual meeting of the Colorado Bar Association. For the purposes of this memorial I, therefore, limit myself on this occasion to the inclusion in this testimonial of an editorial published in the Rocky Mountain News of Denver after Senator WATERMAN'S death; and to brief references to his notable abilities as a practitioner and qualities as a man, received from a prominent member of the Colorado bar, who for years was intimately associated with Senator WATERMAN in general legal practice.

The following is the editorial tribute of the Rocky Mountain News:

"[Editorial in the Rocky Mountain News, Aug. 28, 1932]

"CHARLES W. WATERMAN

"The senatorship came to CHARLES W. WATERMAN too late for him to demonstrate the full measure of his ability.

"So far as Republican Senators are concerned, most of the oratorical and argumentative talent lies with the Progressive group. WATERMAN, however, was an exception among the conservatives. He had the forensic power and the logical force to enable him to meet BORAH on his own ground. Illness prevented him from becoming a national figure.

"In Colorado Senator WATERMAN was the last representative of the old school. Like Senator WOLCOTT he was an archconservative. Also like WOLCOTT, he regarded the senatorship as primarily a national rather than a State office. Foreign policies concerned him more than post offices. While he was one of the men who made possible the development of the sugar beet industry and was a consistent supporter of protection for Colorado industries, he was primarily interested in national affairs.

"Austere, conscientious, taking public office very seriously, WATERMAN was sent to the Senate because people believed in him and despite rather than because of his corporation affiliations. Neither in campaigning nor in the Senate would he truckle for votes or depart from what he regarded as sound principles of government. That course did not win him popularity and he failed of nomination three times before reaching his goal. But he won and kept the respect of his colleagues and the people of the State he represented."

---

Mr. Henry McAllister, Colorado attorney, commented as follows on Senator WATERMAN'S career and personality:

"I have been deeply affected by the death of Senator CHARLES W. WATERMAN.

"I knew him intimately for over 35 years, had frequent professional and personal contact with him, and with one exception among the living, I was perhaps more closely acquainted with him than any other man.

"He rose from poverty to a distinguished position in his profession and in national affairs. When I first became acquainted with him he was associated with the outstanding firm of Wolcott & Vaile (the head of which was the eminent Senator WOLCOTT, the other member being one of the finest characters the West has known), of which firm he later became a partner under the name of Wolcott, Vaile & Waterman. Through native ability and concentration upon his profession of the law, he became one of the great lawyers of the West. He had a clear and legal mind which applied itself to every problem confronting him. He was not only a wise counselor but a great advocate, a man of unbending character and integrity and utterly fearless in professional and public life.

"Mr. WATERMAN was always desirous of rendering public service, and when he had acquired a competence, his one hope was to represent his State in the Senate of the United States. In this he was successful, and into his service as a Senator he carried the earnestness and fidelity which had characterized his practice of the law. Not long after he had achieved his great ambition his health broke but he continued the performance of his public duties with all the vigor and loyalty which his impaired strength permitted, and in his comparatively short career in the Senate he was recognized for his ability, character, and independence. If he had lived and worked in his former good health and strength, he would, in my opinion, have acquired a high position in the councils of the Government.

"Senator WATERMAN'S modesty and retiring disposition made him less well known than his preeminent abilities justified. But with all who knew him well he was distinguished for his talents, the courage of his convictions, and his ambition to render wise service to his State and the Nation."

---

Mr. William E. Hutton's tribute, born similarly of years of friendship and professional association, follows:

"The long illness of Senator WATERMAN prepared his friends for the final tragic news of his death a few months short of the expiration of his one term in the United States Senate. The prime years of his life were devoted to the legal profession, and it was only after his substantial retirement from that profession that he entered the field of politics. From a young man he was ambitious, endowed with an acute mind, great power of application, and unflagging diligence. He was a fighting kind of lawyer, and the years brought him success and that recognition which the courts and the bar and the public give to the able and aggressive. While he tried many jury cases, he surpassed in keen, incisive, and forceful argument to the court on questions of law.

"Abilities which won distinction at the bar were not designed to appeal so effectively to the electorate. It was difficult or impossible for him to pursue a course merely to win popular favor. He stood upon his merit and the merit of the cause he advocated and for these he was respected. His loyalties were constant. His severe logic, Puritan conscience, and unremitting energy made him an invaluable man in certain fields of public service not inviting great public interest or acclaim. His ideas, on the other hand, were conventional, his temper was conservative, and there was little evidence of the spirit of the modern reformer in his public conduct.

"To many he gave the impression of a severe and somewhat aloof nature, not easily approachable. He was undoubtedly slow to encourage intimacy; but, as is so often true of such men, there are those who by close contact came to discover in him a warm, friendly, and sympathetic nature.

"It is a misfortune that the public service for which he was well fitted could not have been available over a longer period."

WESLEY L. JONES

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, WESLEY L. JONES, like Abraham Lincoln, came from the soil. He was born in a humble farm cabin in Illinois. As a barefoot boy and young man he tilled the soil for a widowed mother. The ravages of the Civil War had bereft him of a patriotic father three days before his birth.

Amid direst poverty he grew to rugged manhood. His education was acquired by great personal effort in the primitive schools then available. By day labor and a night school he equipped himself for the law.

Like Lincoln his battle for advancement developed rugged strength of purpose, the ability to see the right, and the tenacity to strive for it through any difficulties.

His long service in the House and the Senate evinced the faith of his people in his honesty, ability, and integrity.

With a wife and infant son he located at north Yakima in Washington in 1889 as that land of promise was merging into statehood. For many years life was still a struggle for the pioneer lawyer. Meanwhile he built fast and firm friendships and was often called for public addresses.

His first campaign for Representative at large from the State of Washington was memorable for his debates with the eloquent sitting Member, Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS, whom he defeated at the November election in 1898.

During the next 10 years he served his State and Nation as a Member of the House. In the House, and later in the Senate, he devoted his time and talents without stint to the many problems confronting our State and Nation. Indian reservations, reclamation, harbors, roads, forests, the Puget Sound Navy Yard, and innumerable other questions had his devoted attention for a third of a century. To no other man are we so deeply indebted for the development of our State as to our late and dearly beloved Senator JONES. He was the father of the Yakima Valley and delighted always in its service. But his effective legislative skill spread to the development of Alaska and to our merchant marine and to the District of Columbia. Senator JONES probably did as much as any other man to clean up the District of Columbia and to rout the saloons from our stately Capitol Building.

In 1908 he was elected to the United States Senate where he served faithfully, efficiently, and with great distinction until his death.

He was the first Chairman of the Commerce Committee from the State of Washington and rendered pioneer service in developing the merchant marine. Later he became chairman of the powerful Appropriations Committee. Thus Senator JONES twice brought to our State honors never achieved before or since.

Vigilant and vigorous though he was in the protection of the local interests of his State, he never emphasized these to the detriment of national issues. He could see beyond local lines and comprehend the problems of the whole Nation and the questions that were international. To-day our country needs such men, who not only think nationally but internationally.

Logical and forceful as a debater, Senator JONES was of the wholesome, practical type of mind, and he left the polemics to other statesmen while he studied the problems of legislation, and seldom made a lengthy address. But his decision once made on the rightness of a question could not be shaken by argument or coercion. The following telegram no doubt expresses the sentiment of all Senators:

The Hon. JOHN W. SUMMERS,
The House of Representatives:

Senator WESLEY L. JONES was loved and respected by all of his associates. I have never known another man who was more transparent in his character and more dependable in all of his undertakings. His untimely death was a loss not only to his State but to the whole country.

ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senator, State of New York.

Perhaps his indomitable courage and firmness were more fully tested in the long struggle to control the liquor traffic of the country than in any other matter. For 20 stormy years, like the Rock of Gibraltar, he stood with Senator SHEPPARD as codefender of the faith in the Senate. Yielding neither to cajolery, abuse, or threats, he stood quietly, firmly, and courageously by his convictions and directed legislation in the interest of this great moral economic question. Never bitter, never abusive, he was a man both tolerant and liberal. He was wont to carry his heavy burdens so cheerfully and accomplish his great undertakings with such modesty that even his family and most intimate friends did not realize that he had given his very life in the service of his country. He wished that the end might be so—that he might work to the very last. He might have greatly prolonged his years, as many another has done, by avoiding the strenuous character of public life and retiring before his appointed time. But among sturdy, valorous men there is never a disposition to leave the scene of conflict.

The home life of Senator JONES was one of true devotion. The wife, son, and daughter made a trio of loyal, admiring lovers for the man who was their devoted husband and father.

For 14 years Senator JONES and I labored in closest harmony for the solution of our legislative problems. I have lost a friend. His subtle sense of humor made him a delightful companion always. His constituents have lost a devoted friend and servant. The State and Nation have lost a wise and patriotic statesman.

Mr. Speaker, as a further tribute to our friend, I here read a letter from Hon. William S. Humphrey, who served seven terms in this House and knew our Senator intimately:

MY DEAR MR. SUMMERS: I am grateful for the opportunity to pay a tribute to the life and memory of Senator WESLEY L. JONES.

He was my friend, my associate, and my colleague for many years. His memory I shall ever cherish. He was one of the noblest characters that ever honored me by his friendship and his confidence.

As to his early struggles and trials, his disappointments and sorrows, of his eventual triumphs over force of circumstance, I leave others to tell. It is a story of a poor, orphan boy who dreamed dreams and by his own efforts made those dreams come true. I think it will be fitting to quote a paragraph from the eulogy I delivered in the House of Representatives on the death of Congressman Cushman:

"The relation of Mr. Cushman, Mr. JONES, and myself was unusual and especially close. For six years we were the only Representatives from our State, and all were elected by the State at large, a condition without precedent in the history of the Republic. The interest of each was the interest of all. There was never the slightest misunderstanding, disagreement, doubt, or distrust among us. No three men ever worked in more perfect harmony or greater trust or with higher mutual confidence. During all that time our vote was never divided on a single important proposition. No act ever occurred to mar in the least degree the confidence that existed. Of this relation the Members of this House have often spoken in terms of appreciated praise. To the two who yet live the record of those years must ever remain a proud and precious memory, a recollection of an association as true, as close, as confidential as ever comes to men in public life. We were more than colleagues. We had tried and trusted each other in all things. Only the awful shadow could break the sacred ties of our friendship. I have always believed that the people of Washington reaped a large reward from this harmonious action. They stamped it with approval by unanimous nominations and by elections practically without opposition and by sending Mr. JONES to the Senate, an honor that they would undoubtedly have conferred upon Mr. Cushman had he lived."

Senator JONES, as a man and as a public servant, was true in every relation in life. He performed every duty—he evaded no responsibility. He practiced no deception. Honesty was one of the outstanding qualities of his rugged character. He was intellectually honest. He was honest with himself and with others. There was about him no cant or hypocrisy. What he preached he practiced. That which his conscience dictated was done. In public and in private life, I have never known a cleaner man.

His knowledge of legislation was unusual. It was not excelled by any man of his generation. He never neglected anything, and he gave to legislation the ability and the tremendous industry that bring success. In devotion to duty he gave his life and health. His industry, his ability, and his success were not surpassed by any public man of his day. This success is ever written on the pages of the history of our State and of our Nation. It will be better known and appreciated as the years go by.

Of all the public men I ever knew, he used his great achievements less for publicity, for self-aggrandizement, and self-glorification. He was not only modest but had an abiding faith that the people would know the truth and do him justice.

He was slow to believe evil of others, and was slow, almost to stubbornness, to be convinced that others believed evil of him. This unusual and admirable trait helped him to keep his poise and to act justly in many trying circumstances. He did not escape calumny. In this respect he suffered the common experience of public men. He bore abuse with the composure born of the consciousness of his own integrity. This evil of the slander of public men will last as long as it is profitable for the sensational press to follow it—so long as demagogy is successful.

Senator JONES had the longest public service of any man that ever represented the State of Washington. He accomplished greater things and achieved greater success than any other man from our State. He had a fuller knowledge of the needs of our State, and he had more influence and gave more help in securing Government assistance to care for those needs than any other man. His achievements, both as to his State and his Nation, exceed those of any other man from our State. The State of Washington will not be able for at least two decades to be as ably represented as it was by Senator JONES. Even if the State could find a man equal in ability, in character, and industry, the experience of Senator JONES could not be equaled. WESLEY L. JONES was the greatest man that the State of Washington has produced.

If there is a time and place in the great hereafter, where each man's record is spread before him and on it he is justly judged, WESLEY L. JONES can look upon his record without fear and with serene certainty that the verdict will be "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," for in all the many pages written in over 30 years of industrious and active life, filled with accomplishments and duties performed, there will not be found the smallest blot of shame nor the slightest trace of disloyalty or dishonesty.

For the last three decades the history of our great parks; our extensive river and harbor improvements; our splendid public buildings; our navy yard; our matchless orchards, redeemed from sand and sagebrush, that are the pride of our State and the wonder of the world; our countless fertile farms taken from the desert; our irrigation projects; our Indian reservations; our magnificient fisheries; our shipping; and, in fact, the history of all industry and commerce of the State of Washington declare the work and influence of Senator JONES and stand as an everlasting monument of his achievements for our State. His work was not alone for his own State. To-day every American flag that flies upon American vessels on the vast ocean highways of all the world eloquently proclaims the patriotism and statesmanship of WESLEY L. JONES.

Mr. Speaker, Hon. Harry Y. Saint, for many years in public service and for a quarter of a century the intimate friend of Senator JONES, has sent me an estimate of the life and character of our friend. With this I conclude my remarks—

Whether a man has been of truly commanding stature, whether his acts have left an indelible imprint on his time, must be left to the verdict of future historians. However, we pause from time to time to chronicle the passing of some statesman. As we review his labors, enumerate his achievements, and put an estimate upon his personality and character, we are prone to ask ourselves what constitutes true greatness, what are the attributes of mind and spirit, what the flashes of genius, what the accomplishments of indomitable will that make for enduring fame?

Great orators have graced the Halls of Congress and charmed on many occasions its crowded galleries; great debaters and expounders of the Constitution have left their impress there; men famed in war, in finance, in business, in diplomacy have passed through its portals and on into the future. The lives of some are still vivid flames of inspiration; those of others are but a memory, fast fading into obscurity. Again, I ask, What are the attributes of greatness? What the hallmarks of distinction? And I make bold to answer that they are those elements of service that will best sustain the Nation and its citizens at any particular period of their history. If a man would live in the hearts of his fellows, he must serve, and his service must be suited to the needs of his day and his people.

I humbly address myself to-day to the memory of our friend who sat as Representative and Senator for 34 years. His name is known to all—Hon. WESLEY L. JONES. I know no man of his generation whose life more nearly exemplifies that real hallmark of distinction—pure, unselfish service—than did his. Senator JONES' life and achievements met the demand of his day and age. His was not a golden era of oratory, of rapierlike wit, of constitutional debate. It was a day of tremendous scientific and mechanical achievement, of social development, of expansion in material wealth. It required of its public servants unceasing care and watchfulness that the rights of the people, great and small, should be safeguarded; that their social development should not be circumscribed; and that the tremendously augmented wealth of the Nation should be the servant and not the master of its destiny. These public obligations became the ideals of his life; to them he gave his all. I believe you will agree with me when I say that no one has occupied a seat in Congress of recent years who gave of himself under every condition of life, with such unflagging devotion, as did our friend, the Senator.

A brief review of his life and a reference to the great public problems to which it was devoted will not be out of place. Like a host of other national figures, Senator JONES was born on a farm, at Bethany, Ill., October 9, 1863, the son of Wesley and Phoebe McKay Jones, and graduated from Southern Illinois College in 1886, a classmate of his lifelong friend Senator BORAH. He was admitted to the bar and married that same year. His wife was Minda Nelson, of Enfield, Ill. Three years thereafter he moved to the Territory of Washington and located at north Yakima and there began the practice of law. He entered politics in 1898 as a candidate for Congress, running against Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, now Senator from Illinois. He was successful in his campaign and entered the House of Representatives in 1899 and served there until 1909, when he was elected to the Senate as the first Senator chosen in the State of Washington by direct vote of the people. He served in the Senate for 23 years and until the hour of his death, at which time he was whip and third ranking Member of his party in that body.

He had many vital legislative interests upon which he left the indelible imprint of his forceful character and keen mentality. He became known as the "father of the American merchant marine." Two acts of Congress fostering a privately owned shipping industry bear his name. He was almost as well known for his advocacy and support of irrigation. Thousands of acres of orchards and meadowland, reclaimed from the desert, bear witness to his untiring efforts.

Senator JONES was always a progressive in political thought; he was not, however, a radical in governmental affairs, unless his advocacy of prohibition can be so construed. Even on this issue he was willing to bow to the will of his constituents and so stated in his final campaign. He was a strict adherent of party government and party discipline. His party's platform endorsed the entry of the United States into the World Court. He consistently advocated it. While he labored arduously for his home State, Washington, his was strictly a national viewpoint, for which he received the criticism in later years of many of his stanchest friends at home. He was ever insistent upon justice for war veterans and was deeply sympathetic to all legislation looking to the betterment of labor and of laboring conditions. He was a firm friend of the Capital City and worked unceasingly for its development and beautification.

Quiet, modest, and unassuming, Senator JONES nevertheless commanded the respect and affection of his fellow Members of the Senate throughout his long career. He was a tireless worker, undeviating in his loyalty to principle, steadfast in his friendships, and unswayed by passion or prejudice. He won over his opponents mainly by his frankness and his simple directness, although he was possessed of a fine command of logical English upon which he called at will. In all his campaigns Senator JONES never availed himself of a political organization. He went personally to the people and discussed with them the problems of his State and the Nation. They understood him and trusted him. That they did so was his greatest source of pride.

Senator JONES is gone. His labors are now become a part of the Nation's history. He fulfilled his life's greatest ambition. He served his day and his people to the full measure of his great ability unto the end.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a tribute by Hon. CLARENCE C. DILL, as follows:

TRIBUTE BY SENATOR CLARENCE C. DILL

When I came to Congress in 1914 and first became well acquainted with Senator WESLEY L. JONES, I heard a statement concerning him which I never forgot. It illustrated his devotion to his work as a Senator. I was told it was his habit to come to work at his office so early in the morning and remain so late in the evening that he always said "Good morning" to his clerks when they arrived and "Good evening" as they left.

During our years of service together here in Congress since that time I have often recalled that statement. It was an explanation of the detailed knowledge he possessed and the persistent efforts he made in connection with every phase of legislation, and especially with legislation and appropriations relating to the State of Washington and the Northwest.

Senator JONES was first elected to the House of Representatives in 1898. He was reelected continuously until 1908, when he was elected to the Senate. He was reelected to the Senate four times, but was defeated in the Democratic landslide in 1932.

As a politician Senator JONES was never spectacular nor did he practice what is sometimes called "playing to the gallery" or "demagoging." He was a regular Republican, yet he dared to differ with his party leaders if their policies interfered with his settled convictions or were against what he thought were the interests of his State or the Northwest. One of his friends once said, "Senator JONES never knocks any flies. He bunts and always plays low ball. That is why he is always safe."

While there is much justification for this description, yet it must be said in fairness that he would fight vigorously for those national policies to which his convictions committed him. This was particularly true with the subject of prohibition. He was an uncompromising dry. He was always in the thick of the prohibition fight in the Senate. He not only talked and voted dry, but he practiced prohibition.

I shall not take time to enumerate his long list of achievements in the form of legislation and appropriations for the State he represented, but I want to call attention particularly to his early and enthusiastic advocacy of Government reclamation. He was most active in the creation of the policy that has done so much for the entire West and particularly for the State of Washington. The Government has expended more than $30,000,000 on irrigation projects in the State of Washington as compared with less than $20,000,000 in the neighboring State of Oregon. Senator JONES deserves great credit for his part in securing these appropriations.

He always considered his work in connection with reclamation with special pride, because he felt that he had rendered his State and his constituents an invaluable service by what he had done in making possible the production of various fruits and other marvelous development in our State on land that was a desert waste before it was reclaimed.

At the time Senator JONES came to Congress the great Territory of Alaska had no Delegate, no Commissioner—in fact, no representative here at all. He soon became a champion of Alaska and had a large part in writing the legislation that did so much to bring about its development.

But he was interested not only in legislative matters affecting his State and the great Northwest. He rendered yeoman service in connection with national problems also. His activity in connection with prohibition legislation made him a national character, and the shipping legislation which bears his name will forever identify him with the maritime developments of this period of our country's history.

If I may add a personal word, I desire to say that during my entire service in Congress beginning in the House in 1914, when he was in the Senate, he and I were close personal friends. He not only welcomed me as a member of the delegation but was extremely helpful in those days when I was a new Congressman. The personal friendship that began then between us continued until the hour of his death.

While we were of different political faiths, I dare say that no two Senators from any State, even of the same party, worked more harmoniously on legislative activities affecting their State.

Senator JONES had the highest respect of his Democratic colleagues, and again and again I have heard Democratic Senators speak in the highest terms of his honesty, his high purpose, his great industry, and his untiring efforts to serve those he represented.

But he was more than a good public official. He was a good citizen. He was a devoted husband and loving father and a fine family man. He was faithful to his own ideals. He had strong convictions and stood for those convictions like a rock. He had no fear of anyone because of disagreement with him.

He longed to serve. He asked no unusual honors in recognition of his service. He found glory enough in the knowledge that he had performed this service. He cared nothing for the pomp and ceremony of public life. He was prouder of being an American citizen than of any other title he might possess.

We miss him in the Senate. We miss his sturdy figure and his earnest face; his clear, strong voice; his patriotic devotion to duty; his fine example of a plain American in high office who never lost his plainness.

The history of Senator JONES's life is a fine heritage for his family and will be an inspiration to the young people of his State and the Nation who learn about him. He rests at last from his labors nobly done. Honor to his memory and peace to his ashes.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a tribute by Hon. HOMER T. BONE, as follows:

TRIBUTE BY SENATOR HOMER T. BONE

For many years my predecessor, the late Senator WESLEY L. JONES, was a highly honored Member of this body. I know his absence from this assemblage must be a source of profound regret to his friends here, and I do you the honor to assume that those Senators who knew and served with him were his friends. He has passed on to a judgment greater than that which any body politic can render. His years of service here were many and full. He was a gentle and kindly man—and this attribute must have unconsciously cemented you to him.

The public career of Senator JONES was characterized to a large degree by absence of that spirit of personal and partisan bitterness which seems to be very often a dominant factor in political life. Those who opposed him in our own State of Washington did so vigorously but without rancor or personal feeling. The State which sent him into this body as its representative is not free from partisan struggles. The acrimonious outcroppings that arise in contests between men of determination and purpose are in evidence there as elsewhere.

Perhaps those of us who are privileged to live in the great evergreen empire that borders the Pacific have acquired some of the characteristics of the countryside in which we live. Our great mountains are serene but immovable.

I know that it is a source of satisfaction to the citizens of my State that the late senatorial campaign was characterized by an almost complete absence of personal allusions—a contest rather of immovable political and economic philosophies than of political or personal stratagems. That this was so is the more gratifying, considering the unhappy conditions which were in themselves provocative of vigorous expression.

I disagreed with the political philosophy of Senator JONES, but in this disagreement I could never bring myself to challenge his honesty of viewpoint. He sincerely believed that the principles and measures he advocated were best. Right or wrong, Senator JONES was himself.

His record stands, and nothing that I might or could say would change it. Many times the sovereign voters of my State conferred upon him the responsibility of representing them here. Time will not alter that record. It must be the proudest heritage of his children. He was defeated, not because the people believed him to be recreant to his duty as he saw it but because new and strange and terrible forces had come to play on the homes and lives of helpless Americans and they believed that the unchanging political philosophy of Senator JONES was inadequate to cope with changed conditions—that it did not harmonize with the change in viewpoint of the people. There was no denying the inexorable demand for change. I am happy in the thought that there was no personal bitterness in the revolt against the political and economic philosophy of Senator JONES. Rather it symbolized the impersonal demand for a new and what seemed a fresher viewpoint. It was an indictment of the unhappy past with its tragedies—its economic miseries. The hearts of the people of my State were heavy. They confronted the strange anomaly of grinding and abysmal poverty in the midst of potential possibilities for wealth production and human happiness, the like of which the world has never seen. It is no reflection on Senator JONES that he should have felt the full force of a ground-swell of popular feeling against economic forces and political philosophies that assailed every home and chilled every heart with fear. It was inevitable that men who seemed to typify the old order should face the opposition of those who had suffered so grievously.

That a public servant should leave his task in circumstances like these, yet blessed with the respect and friendship of those with whom he served so long regardless of political affiliations, is indeed a signal honor. I am happy in the thought that after the campaign and before he passed away I was able to make known to Senator JONES the sentiments I express here to-day. I speak of him to-day with his last fine friendly words of personal encouragement to me fresh in my mind.

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Speaker, Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, United States Senator from the State of Washington, died November 19, 1932. He was my personal friend and in his death I feel a keen personal loss that can not be adequately expressed in words.

It was my privilege to serve in the House of Congress during the last 10 years of Senator JONES' service in the United States Senate. I am a Democrat and he was a Republican, but notwithstanding this difference in party affiliations Senator JONES accorded me the same consideration in matters of legislation and personal relations that he accorded my Republican colleagues in the House from our State. He invited and encouraged me to call on him for assistance and advice in all matters pertaining to my official duties. I availed myself to the fullest extent of opportunities to consult and cooperate freely with him and always found him cordially responsive to every demand made upon him. This was typical of him. Senator JONES was everybody's friend. It may be truly said of him that he was a friend of humanity. His life was dedicated to service. To him, useful service was an obsession—a consuming passion. No duty was too onerous, no burden too heavy for him to bear. No man in public or private life worked harder or gave more of his energies and abilities in the prosecution and accomplishment of his labors than Senator JONES. Long and arduous hours, from early morning till late at night, were all in the day's work with him. He sometimes showed the strain of fatigue but was never irritable and never lost the good cheer and kindliness of his greeting. He had within him the sustaining power of faith and confidence. Each day of his life marked the realization of some hope, the accomplishment of some worthwhile objective. The assurance of success of intelligent effort gave him a poise and evenness of temperament that never deserted him. Effusive elation and depressing despair were alike foreign to him. His habits were temperate, his thoughts were pure, his life was clean. He had a dignity that expressed no autocratic attitude but rather the majesty of democracy. He was a great democrat with a small "d" and a great Republican with a big "R." Senator JONES was a great man who never lost his touch with humanity. He was a great man because he never lost the viewpoint of the common man. Senator JONES was just as democratic the day he died as he was the day he entered Congress as a Representative 34 years previous.

To few men have come the privilege and distinction of serving in the National Congress as long as he. He was first elected to the House of Congress in 1898 and served in this body for 10 years. In 1908 he was elected to the United States Senate, and had he lived until March 3, 1933, he would have completed 24 years of service in that body. He served in Congress under the administrations of seven Presidents of the United States, beginning under President McKinley and ending under President Hoover, and in that time advanced from the humble beginning of a first-termer to the chairmanship of the great Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

The history of the Congress and of national legislation can not be written without according to Senator JONES an outstanding place in those annals. His name will endure in the galaxy of great names of his State and Nation. He has indelibly impressed the genius of his mind on the legislative record of his country. For greatness of character, statesmanship, and worthy manhood, Senator JONES will be honored throughout time. He needs no monument of stone to perpetuate his memory. There is a living monument to his memory in the hearts of all the people. No words of eulogy can add to his fame as no words can sufficiently portray his great and admirable character.

The State of Washington was proud of him, the Nation was proud of him, and all the people loved and honored him. He would crave no other monument.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the honored name of Senator WESLEY L. JONES will live always in the history of his country. He was an outstanding national character, having great influence; and, like all great men, his greatness was manifested in his daily routine of life, his devotion to friends, his tender consideration and helpfulness to all with whom he came in contact, and his passion to render high service to his country.

In the 34 years of his official life at the National Capital, his influence reached to all parts of the Nation, and even beyond. Measured by the standards of morality and by the standards of accomplishment, his record of public service constitutes a worthy and lasting contribution to the historic age in which he lived.

He was truly one of God's stalwart men, who chose to live and do right and to ever despise the wrong. The constant burden of his heart was to be right and helpful in the world, and his success in life was due to the faithful and honorable bearing of that burden to the end.

His memory is an inspiration to all men, and his brotherly love anchored the hearts of his fellows to him in life and sealed them to him for eternity. His popularity was due to his broad, accurate, sympathetic understanding of men and his recognition and practical application of the old common-sense truth which Seneca long ago uttered:

If we wish to be just judges of all things, we must at least understand that no man is without fault; that no man is found who can acquit himself; and if any claim to be wholly innocent, he speaks in reference to a witness and not to his conscience.

My association with him in workshop and on playground was close and intimate. We met often in conferences to iron out differences between the Senate and House on appropriation bills, and for nearly a decade and a half, during week days, when we were in Washington, unless heavy snow or rainstorm forbade, we met at daybreak on golf links within the District, returning always to our homes in time for 8 o'clock breakfast. When Congress was in session he never played at other hours.

There were many friends from the House and Senate who occasionally joined us on the links at the break of dawn, but only Ed Halsey, recently elected Secretary of the Senate, and Jim Preston, now librarian of the Senate, from the Senate official family, can now be recalled as our regular foursome, even for a short season. There were no caddies, no wagers of any kind on the game, but simply a meeting of friends in the early morning hours for wholesome exercise. Jim was the official recorder of all that was said and done when the foursome met, and his diary will not disclose an unkind nor unclean word or thought ever uttered by our beloved companion, the Senator, whose absence has broken the foursome. By us he will always be remembered as one who strikingly exemplified that beautiful character described in the following lines from the pen of Sam Walter Foss:

There are hermit souls that live withdrawn
In the place of their self-content;
There are souls like stars, that dwell apart,
In a fellowless firmament;
There are pioneer souls that blaze their paths
Where highways never ran—
But let me live by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Let me live in a house by the side of the road
Where the race of men go by—
The men who are good and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat
Or hurl the cynic's ban—
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

I see from my house by the side of the road,
By the side of the highway of life,
The men who press with the ardor of hope,
The men who are faint with the strife;
But I turn not away from their smiles nor their tears,
Both parts of an infinite plan—
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

I know there are brook-gladdened meadows ahead
And mountains of wearisome height;
That the road passes on through the long afternoon
And stretches away to the night.
And still I rejoice when the travelers rejoice
And weep with the strangers that moan,
Nor live in my house by the side of the road
Like a man who dwells alone.

Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
It's here the race of men go by;
They are good, they are bad, they are weak, they are strong,
Wise, foolish—so am I.
Then why should I sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban?
Let me live in my house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the ceremonies here to-day indeed impress me with the realization that this House, the Nation, and the State of Washington lost a valuable, well-known Senator in the death of WESLEY L. JONES, and I would not be equal to representing my people if I did not say a few words at this time.

I have known Senator JONES for many years, and learned to admire him for his careful, painstaking, honest interest in all things pertaining to the welfare of the State of Washington, as well as the Nation. He was a man of wonderful capabilities in grasping needful situations, and was always willing and anxious to perform his share of the task in finally accomplishing the end. Men are known by their words and their works. The record of WESLEY L. JONES stands for itself so clear that we might well emulate it.

In his public service he manifested genuine regard for the rights of others. His ambition was to do the right and to act justly toward all men. He was not a great orator, as the term is sometimes used, but was frank and plain in speech. He was, however, a great statesman, and had the sense of justice and fairness which is convincing in its simplicity. He was in no sense conspicuous, for he was a modest and retiring man, but his merit was the more appreciated the longer one knew him. He was one of those genial, faithful, true gentlemen whose worth is never fully known, nor his real value properly estimated, but whose service is crowned with good intentions and faithful effort and whose merit is the more recognized as the real man is studied in the light of his achievements.

I have good reason to speak in praise of this noble man. He and I were not only Members in Congress but we were intimate friends. When I came to Washington a green, raw Member, it was to him I looked for information and advice; and I found him ever ready to help and assist me. I shall miss him in the future.

He believed in the doctrine expressed by the poet who said:

How much joy and comfort we all can bestow
If we scatter sunshine wherever we go.

Those of us who knew him intimately only knew too well how he spread the sunshine wherever he would go. His presence always seemed a message of cheer and good will. He had a window in his heart always open for the expression of his candor and sincerity.

His integrity was superb, but his predominant quality was courage—courage to fight wrong and injustice—yea, courage to stand loyally by a friend.

I shall content myself with calling attention to what seemed to me to be the dominant element of his life—the genial, social kindness of his nature.

It is a noble tribute to a man when it can be said that his life is marked by uniform kindness, and that the more you know of him the better you grow to like him, and this all can be said of our worthy friend, whose memory we cherish and whose life of service and brotherly kindness we admire.

I have sometimes thought that the element of kindness is the noblest element of our nature; that the best and sweetest thing in all this world is simple, common, every-day kindness. Kindness is the most beautiful flower that grows and blooms in the soil of the soul. It is the one celestial flower that blossomed over the walls of paradise and fell from the garden of the skies; its petals caught and carried the fragrance of heaven and it fills the earth with the incense of gladness.

And so I can pay my friend no finer tribute than to say that in his daily life he exemplified the spirit of kindness in his contact with his fellow men. He believed with Washington Irving that—

A kind heart is a fountain of gladness, suffusing everything around it with pleasure and freshens everything into smiles—and with Tennyson when he says:

How'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

EDWARD E. ESLICK

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to say a few words relative to the character and standing of my very dear friend, the Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, who passed away on the 14th day of June, 1932, on the floor of this House, advocating and fighting for that which he thought was just and right.

I realize that I am unable to express my personal feelings, as well as my great appreciation of the character and standing of this man. He died as he lived, fighting for the cause that he thought was right and just. He was not quick to make up his mind, but he always gave it deep consideration. But when he became convinced that he was right he was everlastingly sold on that proposition.

I witnessed his departure, which was one of the greatest shocks of my life; seated on the very front seat in the House of Representatives when we had the bonus bill under consideration, and ED, as I always called him, was replying impromptu to an argument which had just been made and was delivering crushing blows, discussing at that time this matter from a financial standpoint; eloquent were his words; convincing was his argument, but then, well do I remember, in his own language and in his last words, he said: "Let us turn from the sordid affairs." At this moment he began to reel, and as I watched him closely, as he fell, I rushed to his side, trying to reach him before he fell to the floor, but I did not, and he was gone. We carried him in the Speaker's lobby and laid him on a couch, but he was dead. I will never forget this scene; nothing could have been more tragic and more shocking to me. The people's friend and my friend was gone. I realize that we will never again hear the silver-tongued words of this great man. A limited time being given Mr. ESLICK for this speech, as is customary in the House, and not having used all that time when he fell, the Speaker announced in this language: "The gentleman yields back the balance of his time." When we consider these words we now realize how true that statement was, and this incident will go down in history as one of the saddest that ever occurred in the House of Representatives.

There was no man better known in the State of Tennessee than ED ESLICK. I had known him for some 30 years. He was State elector when quite a young man, and no battle for Democracy in the State of Tennessee had ever been made during this time in which you did not hear the eloquent tongue of ED ESLICK in behalf of his party; and yet, while he was always in the forefront fighting for Democracy upon every stump in the State of Tennessee, he practiced his own profession, that of a lawyer, and never asked for office until he was elected to Congress in 1924. Soon after he came to Congress his real worth was appreciated, although we might consider him a very quiet and retiring man. When he went on the floor of the House the Members expected something from him, and they were never disappointed. When a vacancy occurred on the Committee on Ways and Means, one of the largest committees of the House, he was elected as a member of that committee, and when he passed away he had reached that period where he could have been, and would have been, of great benefit to his constituents and to the people of his country.

As I knew ED ESLICK, he was a plain man; disliked dress affairs, and, in fact, dressed himself in the same character of clothes that he had worn for years. He was a great student of history, and especially of biography, and of State and national affairs, and was the best to remember dates of political incidents that I have ever known. He was greatly interested in prominent men who had gone before, and if he had any hobby it was that of visiting and seeing for himself the last resting place of these great characters. I remember on one occasion that I drove with him to Baltimore, Md., in order to see the tomb of Edgar Allen Poe.

I knew him in his home, and no one could have been more happy and contented than he, and I might add that his good wife, who is brilliant and most gracious, was his greatest aid in accomplishing what he did. I have visited in his home, and I knew his home life, and no one could make you feel that you were more welcome than ED ESLICK.

In his passing away the people of his congressional district have tried to show their appreciation of his services, and they did this by electing his good wife as a Member of Congress to fill out his unexpired term, not only on her worth but as evidence of the services that her great husband had rendered to his people.

It makes me sad, even unto this day, to remind myself of the tragic death of my good friend.

I merely want to state in closing that when ED ESLICK passed away, not only the people of his district and of the State of Tennessee, but the people of the Nation, lost one of their greatest advocates, who could always be found on the firing line, fighting for the masses of the people.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the most heroic death is to die in the service of one's country. "Killed in action" was the citation of greatest glory during the World War. This badge of honor was earned by our beloved colleague, Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, to whom the final summons came while he was speaking in this historic Chamber.

It was fittingly appropriate that his last speech and the very last act of his life should have been advocating legislation in behalf of the World War veterans, whom he loved and whose service he was always pleased to glorify. Knowing him as I did, I am sure, if he had known that this was to have been his last address, he would have chosen the subject that he was discussing for he believed with all of his heart in doing full justice to the Nation's defenders in time of war, and he had a deep and abiding conviction that payment of the adjusted-service certificates was not only just to the veterans but also best for the Nation's welfare.

He did not reach conclusions hastily. He was not impetuous or impulsive in his advocacy of any cause. His judicial mind and temperament caused him to investigate and weigh the facts and their effects, and then, when he determined what he conceived to be right, he was fearless and invincible in the defense of his convictions. He was an able and eloquent advocate, a distinguished lawyer who achieved a marked degree of success in the active practice of his profession. Courts and juries, not only in his native State of Tennessee but elsewhere, heard his voice pleading his clients' cause. Some years ago I recall he came to Texas in behalf of a client who was a former Tennesseean, and by his eloquence and logic convinced a Texas jury that his client was right.

For nine years he served as an able and distinguished Member of this House. In recognition of his ability he was given a place upon the Ways and Means Committee, upon which important committee he was serving when he was called to lay his armor down.

His character and his private life, like his service to his country, was unsullied and untarnished. He loved deeply with a deathless devotion his wife, his friends, his country.

Greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his life for his friends.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, EDWARD EVERETT ESLICK was born in Giles County, Tenn., April 19, 1872; he was admitted to the bar in 1893 and commenced his law practice in Pulaski; he also engaged in banking and agricultural pursuits.

Mr. ESLICK was generally recognized as an able, brilliant lawyer, and enjoyed a splendid law practice. He was a loyal Democrat and always took an active interest in public affairs, and rendered faithful service to the Democratic Party. He was presidential elector on the Democratic ticket of Bryan and Sewell in 1896; of Bryan and Stevenson in 1900; and of Parker and Davis in 1904; as such he campaigned over the entire State of Tennessee in behalf of the Democratic ticket, and had a state-wide reputation as an eloquent, forceful, and brilliant campaign orator, and his services were in great demand.

Mr. ESLICK was elected as a Democrat to the Sixty-ninth Congress, his term commencing March 4, 1925; he was renominated and reelected to the Seventieth, the Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congresses, serving until his tragic death on Tuesday, June 14, 1932.

On that day he was addressing the House of Representatives in favor of a bill, then being considered, to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates. He was speaking in his customary forceful and eloquent manner. There was not the slightest evidence of physical or mental distress; his mind and voice were functioning perfectly, until in the midst of a sentence he was stricken and fell and was carried from the Chamber by some of his colleagues. The physicians, who reached Mr. ESLICK a few minutes later, gave it as their opinion that his heart never beat after he fell. It is said that he is the only Representative who ever expired in the House of Representatives.

I am hereafter inserting the speech which Mr. ESLICK was delivering on the occasion of his death, together with the proceedings following, as they appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ESLICK's devoted wife was in the House Gallery when he was stricken with the fatal heart attack. We Members of the Tennessee delegation and other colleagues of Congressman ESLICK were delegated by the House of Representatives to attend his funeral. We accompanied his remains and Mrs. ESLICK from Washington to Pulaski, their home. We left the train at Decatur, Ala., and rode in automobiles from there to Pulaski. There were crowds gathered in every town through which we passed, even in Alabama, and the citizens stood with bared heads as we passed; in some of the towns American Legionnaires in uniform stood at attention. There was gathered at the funeral a vast concourse of citizens who had come from far and near, including numerous prominent citizens and officials. This immense crowd and the universal expression of sorrow constituted a beautiful tribute to the life and character of Representative ESLICK.

While I had a general acquaintance with him for some years previous, yet from the time when he and I both were electors on the Democratic presidential ticket in 1904 until his death Mr. ESLICK and I were intimate friends.

He was a man of high ideals, great strength of character, pronounced convictions, genuine courage, patriotic, and conscientious. He possessed splendid ability and unusually good common sense. He was held in the highest esteem by his colleagues on both sides of the Chamber. He never addressed the House unless he had something worth while to say, and he always commanded the attention of his colleagues when he did speak. He despised sham, pretense, hypocrisy, demagoguery, and show. He was sincere and genuine through and through. He was a true Democrat, a brilliant lawyer, a real statesman, and a genuine patriot.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

[Speech of Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, of Tennessee, in the House of Representatives, Tuesday, June 14, 1932. The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7226) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates]

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means it was my pleasure to support the Patman bill embodying the Owen amendment. The magnificent address of my colleague, Captain BROWNING, of Tennessee, presents my own views and my thought upon the financial end of this question more eloquently than I can present it. I want to talk about another element and feature entering into this debate.

I listened to my leader and chieftain the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], with whom I seldom agree. I listened to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], and he and I did agree in our red chase over the country, and that is about the only agreement we have had. I looked into the face of these two men as they stood here telling of the glories of the soldier. They were willing to pay him, but Shylock's bond was not yet due. They were all ready to pay. The soldier was great, he was good, he was glorious, but the bond was not yet due, and Shylock stood there and said, "Hands off," when it came to payment. May I not say to the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from New York that we have had other obligations. This may mean a revision of this contract. Did we not have the French and Italian debt-settlement bond to pay us money with 5 per cent interest, and when it came to a revision of these contracts you gentlemen, shoulder to shoulder, took from the par value of 100 cents and settled with Italy at 24 cents on the dollar, and with France at 46 cents on the dollar. You do not believe in revision now, but you revised to give away billions of the American taxpayers' money, and did you add a postscript to it in revising again? Did you know it would be necessary in 1931 to declare a moratorium and withhold from the Public Treasury $252,000,000 of the people's money? That is not all.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESLICK. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Does not the gentleman know that that money was loaned during the war to keep their armies in the field, and when they refused to pay we had to make the best settlement we could; that the only way to collect it if we did not do it was to send an army over to collect it?

Mr. ESLICK. That may be true, and these boys were there to protect the flag that your Government might live.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESLICK. Oh, I can not give up all of my time. Then there is another thing. When your Government and the States granted charters to railroads and corporations of the country, did you have any provision that when bankruptcy looked over the hills you would rush into the American Congress and form a $2,000,000,000 corporation that you might save them from insolvency? You dipped your hand into the Federal Treasury and you took $500,000,000 from it and you based a credit with the Government, and the Treasury to-day is the sole purchaser of the obligations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—$2,000,000,000 to uphold these great corporations. Gentlemen, you were willing to reform these contracts, but when the American soldier comes you were unwilling to reform his contract and pay a hungry and a needy man. Oh, you tell me how good you have been to the soldier. Yes; you worked him at a dollar a day with a $10 civilian beside him, and when you discharged that civilian you gave him a bonus of $240, and the soldier $60—not enough to buy him a new suit of clothes and a clean pair of socks.

This is the history of it. I am told what other countries have done. England gave her men a bonus of $1,427; Belgium, $492; Canada, a private $600 and officers $972; France, $249; and Uncle Sam, the richest government in all the world, gave $60, with an I O U "that I will pay you 27 years after Armistice Day."

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to divert from the sordid. We hear nothing but dollars here. I want to go from the sordid side——

(At this point Mr. ESLICK was stricken and fell and was carried from the Chamber by his colleagues.)

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE EDWARD E. ESLICK

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the sad announcement that our distinguished and beloved colleague, Representative EDWARD E. ESLICK, of Tennessee, has just passed away. He was stricken at his post of duty while addressing the House in favor of the pending bill providing for the payment of adjusted-service certificates.

I have in my hand a portion of the speech which he had prepared as a conclusion, and I ask unanimous consent that his remarks may be extended in the RECORD by inserting the remainder of his speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Mr. ESLICK. The 4,300,000 World War veterans were the flower of our manhood. They were our fighting men, picked from 24,000,000 within the draft age. They turned their faces to the east to fight upon the fields where the master warriors—Napoleon and Wellington—had battled more than a hundred years ago. They went from the fields of peace to the shambles of the bloody battlefields of modern war.

They went to battle that free government might live, that world civilization might continue, and human happiness exist. The destiny of mankind was entrusted to them, and they did not betray that trust. They carried with them a courage that proclaimed new military tactics to the old world—that the American soldier knew how to advance, but never knew the code of retreat.

When they started over there our people blessed them and promised them a home and the best when they returned—their places would be waiting for them. Some of them did not return. They are sleeping "over there." Many of them came back. Washington, the Capital City, greeted them, the great and victorious American Army, as they marched down Pennsylvania Avenue. Immortal Woodrow Wilson reviewed them.

Soon the tumult and the shouting died away, and their places were not given back to them. Their jobs were gone. They must take up the broken thread of life again. They started anew on life's unfinished road. They have passed 13 mile posts since Armistice Day.

And there was another parade on Pennsylvania Avenue. There was no President, no Commander in Chief, to review the ragged remnants of Pershing's own. As the shadows of the night fell the shadows of the greatest American Army came, as one writer says, "The ghosts of war-time glory," paraded again. These men were among the victors in the battles of war—but defeated in the battles of civil life. They were the representation of a million of their buddies in the great army of the wholly unemployed—hungry, down and out—and another half million of their buddies employed from one to three days a week. These men come to the American Congress and say, you paid everybody else in cash—we ask no charity. Be fair! Be fair to us!

You say this is sentiment. I answer, yes; and ours is a patriotic, a sentimental people. Patriotism is born of sentiment. The monuments to the heroic dead proclaim the sentiment of our people. Bread for the living when hungry is a greater sentiment than stones for the dead. The payment of the veterans' certificates, which means bread to them and their families, is worth more than all the pomp and glory and flowers by the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

For one, I shall vote that the veterans may have whatever comfort the payment of the balance of their certificates will bring to them.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is with the deepest sorrow that I announce the sudden passing of my colleague, the Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, of Tennessee. His death, occurring upon the floor of the House in the midst of a speech, came as a distinct shock to every Member of the House.

He was beloved and esteemed by every Member of the House, just as he was beloved and esteemed by every citizen in his State. No man was better known in Tennessee than ED ESLICK. No man was better loved in that State for his many splendid qualities of both mind and heart. For many years he has been prominent in the councils of the State, and when he came here as a Member in this House he quickly won a warm place in the hearts and in the affections of all his colleagues.

He was one of the most lovable characters I have ever known. I loved him devotedly, and this is true of every member of his delegation. He was quiet and reserved, but always sympathetic. He was a close student and a lover of the best in literature, and was one of the best informed men I knew on every public question. He was an able and faithful representative of his people, and there is not one of them who will not feel a personal loss in his death.

On behalf of the entire House, I wish to extend the sincerest sympathy to Mrs. ESLICK, his devoted and understanding wife, who was not only a comfort to him but a great help in his every undertaking.

He died as I knew he would have preferred to die, here upon the floor of the House, the scene of his labors for a number of years and in the active discharge of his duties.

The Congress, the Nation, his State, and his congressional district have suffered a great loss in his passing.

Mr. Speaker, I need say no more, and I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

"House Resolution 265

"Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

"Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

"Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased."

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint the funeral committee to-morrow. The Clerk will report the balance of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMP. Mr. Speaker, the sudden passing of my esteemed colleague, EDWARD EVERETT ESLICK, who was stricken while addressing this House on June 14, 1932, and expired a few moments later, brought to a close the career of a most worthy Representative of the seventh district of Tennessee, whose record of service to his district, State, and Nation will stand as a perpetual monument to his memory.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. ESLICK, though slight, extended over many years. Politically, I knew him well, as we were always on opposite sides in State politics. Nevertheless, I entertained the highest respect for his sense of fairness, honesty of purpose, and courage in championing those causes which he espoused.

After coming to Congress, my more intimate association with Mr. ESLICK served to strengthen my estimation, and gave me an enlarged appreciation of the character of the man. I am sure that every Member of this body who served with him held for EDWARD EVERETT ESLICK an affectionate regard, and appraised him as a man of outstanding ability, integrity, and patriotism.

He was absolutely honest in spirit and deed, a trustworthy friend, and a useful, upstanding American.

It was most fitting, indeed, that the good people of his district, who had known him always, gave added honor to his high and illustrious name by sending his wife, a most charming and estimable lady, to finish the work he had left undone.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful for this opportunity to raise my voice in brief tribute to the life, character, and public service of my warm friend and colleague, the Hon. EDWARD E. ESLICK, late a Representative from my native State of Tennessee, who passed away while serving as a Member of the House of Representatives during this Congress.

"The gentleman from Tennessee yields back the balance of his time." This solemn announcement was made by that great southern statesman, Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, who was presiding as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shortly after noon on June 14, 1932. This announcement is frequently heard in the House, indicating that the Member has finished his remarks before the expiration of the time allotted to him to speak. In this case the announcement gave utterance to the literal truth, for the gentleman from Tennessee had yielded back the balance of his time in this life. He had been stricken at his post of duty while on his feet speaking to the House. He was speaking on a subject very dear to him, for the bill then under consideration provided for the payment of the balance due on the adjusted-service certificates of the veterans of the World War. He was always a devoted friend of those patriots who had offered to give their lives upon the altar of our country, and he held the genuine affection and esteem of them.

It had been my privilege to know Mr. ESLICK very pleasantly for many years, having known him prior to the beginning of my term of service as a Member of the House of Representatives. Our relations as Members of the Tennessee delegation in Congress had always been most cordial and pleasant, and it was my privilege to number him among my closest and warmest friends.

Mr. ESLICK came from the finest stock of pure Americans, and his early training was of that type which produces the strong and noble character possessed by him. Since early manhood he had been a member of the legal profession and always took a great interest in public affairs. For many years prior to his election to Congress, he had been recognized as one of the outstanding members of the legal profession of Tennessee. He was a man of extensive farming interests, and during his service in Congress always took a great interest in legislation especially affecting agriculture. He was first elected to Congress in 1924 and served continuously until the time of his death. He was a prominent member of the important Committee on Ways and Means and made a great contribution of service to the important work of this great committee.

In early manhood he was married to Miss Willa Blake, a most charming and attractive young lady of Tennessee, and this union formed one of the happiest and most devoted domestic lives that it has ever been my privilege to know. He is survived by Mrs. ESLICK, who has been nominated and elected by the splendid citizenship of their district to succeed him as a Member of Congress. A most charming and able woman, she has served with credit and distinction as a Member of the House during this session of Congress.

Always taking a great interest in public affairs, Mr. ESLICK had always given liberally of his time, means, and ability toward the success of the Democratic Party, of which he was a lifelong and devoted member. His voice had been raised in fighting his party battles in every campaign in Tennessee for 40 years. Few men indeed have enjoyed the distinction of making more speeches in the interest of the party and success of its nominees than had Mr. ESLICK. He was recognized as a great southern orator of the old school and possessed a degree of forensic ability which has seldom been equaled in the history of his State. He was a man of strong character and convictions and had always been found on the right side of every great moral issue. He possessed the highest attributes of Christian character and all of the sterling qualities of manhood. He was a man of most pleasing personality and was always a most delightful and congenial companion. He was indeed one of the strongest and ablest Members of the House of Representatives, and his passing is a distinct loss, not only to the people of his district but to the State and Nation. He was a true patriot and a most efficient public servant devoted to the interest and welfare of the people that he so ably represented. His great life, character, and public service are indeed an inspiration and may well be emulated by those who come after him.

HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Mr. TUCKER, the constituency that he served with such distinction, his beloved Virginia, and the Nation have suffered a distinct loss.

It is not an exaggeration to say that no Member of the House of Representatives was held in higher regard or looked upon with more deference than was our deceased colleague. This has always been a matter of great pride to the Virginia delegation in Congress. His unalterable devotion to the Constitution, and his unwillingness ever to compromise on any question that might infringe upon its integrity, was a bright and shining star in his legislative career. The Virginia delegation will miss him. His genial smile and his warmth of spirit drew to him among his colleagues in the House of Representatives a friendship that I know was one of the inspirations of his life. May I say that I feel a sense of deep personal loss in the passing of my friend. When I came to Congress 10 years ago I was delighted to be able to draw freely upon the vast experience and wise counsel of this distinguished man.

His was a thorough knowledge and understanding of constitutional government. Mr. TUCKER impressed himself and his philosophy of government upon the House of Representatives, and though he has gone from us that impression will linger on.

Were a star quenched on high,
  Forever would its light
Still travel downward through the sky,
  Fall on our mortal sight.

So when a good man dies,
  For years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him
  Shines upon the paths of men.

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I wish to speak briefly of the life and public service of my friend the Hon. HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER.

As a Virginian, I had read and heard of "HARRY" ST. GEORGE TUCKER, for many years before I met him. Of a type that was somewhat rare 50 years ago and even more rare now, from the beginning of his young manhood he had impressed those with whom he had come in contact as a young man whose life was full of a promise that he would faithfully carry out the ideals of a people, even of a people who have been called more idealistic than practical. Maybe, in these days idealism has become a fault, but the great movements of the world have been promoted by those possessing this trait. A gentleman himself, and having in his own mind the definition of that much-abused word, he trusted other men as he expected them to trust him. Sometimes possibly such faith in the unselfishness of mankind to their fellow beings acted to his hurt, but it never soured the sweetness of his own disposition nor caused him to deviate from the path of high honor which he elected to tread.

His family background was replete with splendid memories, stories of other days in old Virginia from the earliest times. Not one generation, but every generation of his family had played their part in the history of the State. The progenitor of the family in Virginia was St. George Tucker, who came from Bermuda to study law at the college of William and Mary, in Williamsburg, Va. On the breaking out of hostilities with Great Britain, he took the part of his adopted country and gave ample proof of his courage and devotion on the field of Guilford. In the meantime, he married "the widow Randolph," thereby becoming the stepfather of that brilliant but erratic genius, John Randolph of Roanoke. The first of the line was professor of law at William and Mary College, and through the three successive generations they became a family of great lawyers. His son, Henry St. George Tucker, the grandfather of the subject of this address, was a professor of law at the University of Virginia, president of the Supreme Court of Appeals and declined the office of Attorney General tendered him by President Jackson; was the author of several law books, and served two terms in the House of Representatives. His son, John Randolph Tucker, was professor of law at Washington and Lee University, author of legal works, attorney general of Virginia, and served six terms in Congress. He was also president of the American Bar Association.

So it is not surprising, if there be such a thing as hereditary traits that HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER—"HARRY" TUCKER, as everyone called him and as he liked to be called—the son of John Randolph Tucker and the grandson of Henry St. George Tucker, turned his attention to the legal profession. His activities in the law and in Congress did not dim the luster of the family name in either law or statecraft.

HARRY TUCKER was born in 1853 at Winchester, Va.; he graduated in law at Washington and Lee University, at Lexington, Va., in 1876; he practiced law at Staunton until 1889; and he lived and died at Lexington. The range of his vision was the beautiful Valley of the Shenandoah, which he loved with a great devotion. He drew the inspiration of his life from that historic environment and from the mountain ranges surrounding it. Only 12 years old when the War between the States ended, he as a boy went through the war and terrors of the reconstruction period. His beloved valley was devastated by the four years of conflict and held back in its progress in the years that followed by the utter poverty of the State and its people. There were no State educational facilities worthy of the name, but with a natural desire for learning he got his preliminary training at private schools and then went to the University of Washington and Lee to complete his study in his chosen profession.

He began his practice at Staunton, but after a few years he was drawn to the other inherited activity of his ancestors, politics. He served from 1889 to 1897 in the House of Representatives and then became professor of law at Washington and Lee University upon the death of his father, who had held that chair for many years. He did fine work in this position and attained high rank as a teacher of constitutional law. His reputation throughout the country in the legal profession was responsible for his being elected as president of the American Bar Association in 1905, again carrying out one of the traditions of the family.

After spending several years in writing law books, he became again interested in Virginia politics and was twice a candidate for governor. Though he did not realize his ambitions in this particular, he gained the affection and respect of the people of the State, even of those who did not agree with him politically. He became a Member of the Sixty-seventh Congress in 1922 and served as Representative from the tenth congressional district of Virginia until his death.

In a sketch necessarily brief as this must be it is not possible to go into the details of his career, though the impress which he made upon Virginia and its people make him worthy of holding a high rank among its distinguished men. It is a pity that he did not leave behind him the story of the times in which he lived, for his life's devotion was given to the State in which he was born and which he loved, and through the years of his life the State seceded from the Union, became the theater of armed conflict, saw its political freedom taken away from it by political trickery and corruption, saw the intelligence and energy of its people overcome its disasters and begin to rebuild anew the foundations which had been destroyed; then saw the development, industrially and politically, until to-day Virginia ranks again among the foremost States of the Union. "HARRY" TUCKER played his part in these affairs, and played it like the man of courage and character that he was, earning the admiration of the people of the State for his devotion to its high ideals.

I can not close this brief sketch without expressing personally my own sorrow at his passing. I had known him for many years before he and I met in the Halls of Congress and I had the highest regard for his ability and for him personally. He gave me his friendship and evidenced in many ways his affection for me. I honored him and loved him and was guided by his counsel in matters affecting legislation. No man in my legislative career has seemed to me to possess a higher degree of patriotism in the service of his country than Mr. TUCKER.

The State of Virginia has lost one of its distinguished sons.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to express myself adequately on this sad occasion. I have known our departed colleague, Hon. HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, nearly 50 years and have been intimately associated with him almost from our first meeting. He was a man of rare intellect, a statesman of remarkable ability, an educator of note, a distinguished writer, a profound lawyer, and a great student of the Constitution, to which he devoted a large part of his life, and in this sphere few were his equal.

Mr. TUCKER was a gentleman typical of the old South. He had a rare courage and foresight, and because of his deep interest in public affairs he early in life entered upon a public career. This was a natural calling. His father, the Hon. John Randolph Tucker, served with distinction in this House a long time, and his grandfather, the Hon. Henry St. George Tucker, after whom he was named, likewise served with great distinction in the Congress. Mr. TUCKER was known and held in high esteem throughout the Commonwealth of Virginia. His unusual abilities won him an exalted place in this House and the admiration and affection of his colleagues. He was very serious, patient, and diligent in the performance of all his duties, and his views and opinions were of inestimable value and help to those who served with him on the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I have the honor to be a member.

Our colleague had a personality and character that was very unique and endeared him to a host of people. He was a close friend of President Cleveland, and this intimacy existed until the passing of that great man. Legislation of far-reaching importance on the statute books of the Nation bears his name and establishes his reputation as a legislator of renown. He was kind, generous, and considerate, and permitted no inconvenience to deter him from helping those in distress or in giving comfort to those in the trough of despair. He was a true and tried friend.

Mr. TUCKER was in the eightieth year of his age. He had enjoyed very remarkable vigor for his years, and was stricken last winter with influenza while attending the sessions of Congress. Heart disease developed and under its repeated attacks his strength failed. He returned to his old home, Col Alto, in Lexington, Va., and there, with the setting of the sun and the quiet of the approach of evening, surrounded by his beloved family, his soul took flight from this earth. Thus was written the final chapter of the noble record of a pure, upright life, and one of useful, distinguished service to his district, State, and Nation. Mr. TUCKER is with us no more, but his great character and beautiful life are indelibly impressed upon our memories, and in our hearts he will live forever.

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to pay tribute to the memory of our beloved friend and associate, HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER. In his passing the State of Virginia and the entire Union mourns the loss of an eminent and capable Representative in the Congress of the United States.

This lovable man lived a life of unusual activity and achievement. His success was rapid and continuous, and his entire career was one of outstanding distinction. From the time he was first admitted to the bar, his progress in the practice of law was steady and he became one of the greatest lawyers and jurists the Old Dominion has ever produced. He was a noted authority on constitutional and international law, having had a distinguished career as professor of such subjects in leading colleges and law schools. He was editor of numerous outstanding works on the Constitution of the United States and on constitutional law generally. While serving in the Congress of the United States, representing the tenth congressional district of his State, he was a most useful, active, and valuable member of the Judiciary Committee.

During his long term of service in this House he won the friendship of men of all parties, who were attracted to him by his worth and personal merits and paid him the respect thus commanded regardless of party affiliations. One of his most notable traits of character was a downright straightforwardness which never deviated. It was either "yes" or "no" with him, and whichever it was, the verdict was to be depended upon to the end.

He possessed a rare personal charm of manner, the natural result of a kindly and generous disposition. He enjoyed dispensing hospitality, and it gave him pleasure to make others happy. It must not be understood that this inferred any weakness of character, for he could be adamant upon occasion and stern and inflexible when circumstance required.

Another admirable trait of his nature was his demeanor of rare and punctilious courtesy toward everyone, regardless of rank or social position. Indeed, the humbler the individual, the more marked would be his consideration of that person's feelings and rights.

He was one of God's noblemen and a friend to mankind. In his death his State and country lost a worthy son and his friends a companion whose presence will be missed, but whose memory and influence will survive long afterwards.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER was born in Winchester, Frederick County, Va., on April 5, 1853, and died at his home in Lexington, Va., on July 23, 1932. His parents were John Randolph Tucker and Laura (Powell) Tucker.

Mr. TUCKER was descended from a family which for 300 years had held positions of first importance in the Bermuda Islands and in Virginia. His family is traced in England to William Tucker, of Thornby, County Dwin. Two of the family were much interested in the English settlement at Jamestown. One of these, George Tucker, was a member of the London Company; and the other, Daniel Tucker, after living in Virginia, became in 1616 Governor of Bermuda.

From this line came Mr. TUCKER's great-grandfather, St. George Tucker, who came to Virginia about 1770. He became a student at the College of William and Mary in Williamsburg, Va., and entered later upon the practice of law. When the Revolutionary War commenced, he conducted a secret and successful expedition to Bermuda, where he captured military stores, which he brought home and which were used by General Washington at Boston.

Later he became a colonel in the American Army, distinguished himself by his courage and conduct at Guilford Courthouse, and took an active part in the siege of Yorktown. He served as one of the commissioners at the Annapolis convention which recommended the Philadelphia convention, where the Constitution of the United States was framed.

Afterwards, St. George Tucker became professor of law in the College of William and Mary, where he succeeded the eminent chancellor and first American law teacher, George Wythe. He also served with distinction as judge of the general court of Virginia. He married Frances Bland Randolph, widow of John Randolph and mother of John Randolph, of Roanoke.

The name "St. George" in the Tucker family originated with George Tucker, who emigrated, during the civil war in England, to Bermuda, and died there about 1662. He married Frances, daughter of Sir Henry St. George, Knight of the Garter and principal king of arms, whence the name.

Henry St. George Tucker, son of St. George Tucker and grandfather of the subject of this sketch, served as a Member of the House in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Congresses from March 4, 1815, to March 3, 1819, when he retired voluntarily, becoming thereafter chancellor of the fourth judicial district of Virginia, where he served from 1824 to 1831. Then he became president of the court of appeals of Virginia. He filled this position until 1841, when he was appointed professor of law at the University of Virginia.

John Randolph Tucker, father of our late colleague, served from March 4, 1875, to March 3, 1887, as a Member of the House in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, and Forty-ninth Congresses, declining to be a candidate for renomination in 1886. He was elected professor of constitutional law at Washington and Lee University in 1888, and filled that position until his death in Lexington on February 13, 1897.

Another relative of Mr. TUCKER's served as a Member of the House from the State of South Carolina in the First and Second Congresses. This was Thomas Tudor Tucker, uncle of Mr. TUCKER's grandfather. He was born at Port Royal, Bermuda, June 25, 1745, served as a surgeon in the Revolutionary Army, was a Member of Congress from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1793, and was appointed United States Treasurer by Thomas Jefferson, serving from December 1, 1801, until his death, on May 2, 1828.

George Tucker, another relative, born in St. Georges, Bermuda, served in the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Congresses, from March 4, 1819, to March 3, 1825. He was appointed by Thomas Jefferson as first professor of moral philosophy at the University of Virginia, that chair then embracing finance and economics.

HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, whose loss we lament, was the third in direct line to serve in the House of Representatives of the United States. Here he spent 18⅓ years of his useful, busy life. His services began on March 4, 1889, in the Fifty-first Congress, and he continued as a Member through the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, and Fifty-fourth Congresses, retiring voluntarily on March 3, 1897. He returned to the Sixty-seventh Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Henry D. Flood. He qualified on March 25, 1922, and continued as a Member to the time of his death.

Mr. TUCKER came of a line of lawyers, teachers, jurists, and authors. He was the fourth in direct line in his family to serve as professor of law. His great-grandfather, St. George Tucker, was professor of law at the College of William and Mary, succeeding the eminent teacher George Wythe. His grandfather, Henry St. George Tucker, was professor of law at the University of Virginia from 1841 to 1845. His father, John Randolph Tucker, was professor of equity and public law at Washington and Lee University before he served in Congress, and was again in 1888 elected professor of constitutional law at Washington and Lee University. That position he filled until his death, in 1897.

Mr. TUCKER also came of a line of authors. His grandfather, Henry St. George Tucker, was the author of Tucker's Commentaries, and Treatises on Natural Law, and on the Formation of the Constitution of the United States, which were textbooks at the University of Virginia. His father, John Randolph Tucker, was author of Tucker on the Constitution.

Mr. TUCKER also came of a line of jurists. His great-grandfather, St. George Tucker, served as a judge of the general court before his appointment as professor of law in the College of William and Mary. In 1803 he was elected to succeed President Pendleton on the bench of the court of appeals of Virginia. Here he served with distinction until he resigned in 1811. In 1813 he accepted the position tendered him by President Madison as judge of the district court of the United States. This position he held for many years until ill health compelled his resignation.

Mr. TUCKER's grandfather, Henry St. George Tucker, served for seven years as judge of the superior courts of chancery for the Winchester and Clarksburg districts, and in 1831 was elected president of the court of appeals of Virginia, where he remained until August, 1841, when he resigned to become professor of law at the University of Virginia.

It is not surprising that, with this background, our colleague became a teacher of law and also an author. In 1897 he was elected professor of constitutional law and equity in Washington and Lee University to succeed his father, John Randolph Tucker, and was dean of the law school of that university in 1900. After G. W. C. Lee retired from the presidency of the university, Mr. TUCKER served as president for a time, but in 1902 he resigned his chair at Washington and Lee and accepted an invitation to become dean of the schools of law and diplomacy at Columbian University, now the George Washington University, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TUCKER was also an author of distinction. He edited Tucker on the Constitution, of which his father was the author, and wrote Woman Suffrage by Constitutional Amendment, and Limitations on the Treaty Making Power under the Constitution, as well as many treatises and papers.

The attainments of Mr. TUCKER and his father were nationally recognized. The father served as president of the American Bar Association in 1894, and Mr. TUCKER was president of the same association in 1905. The University of Mississippi and Columbian University at Washington conferred upon Mr. TUCKER the degrees of doctor of laws.

When Mr. TUCKER first served in Congress, Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, was Speaker and among Mr. TUCKER's colleagues in the House were such outstanding men in political life as William M. Springer, of Illinois; John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky; Samuel S. Cox and Amos J. Cummings, of New York City; Roger Q. Mills, of Texas; Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia; William McKinley, of Ohio; Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio; and Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois.

In the Senate were John W. Daniel and John S. Barbour from his own State of Virginia; John T. Morgan, of Alabama; Wade Hampton, of South Carolina; Daniel W. Voorhees, of Indiana; William B. Allison, of Iowa; Arthur Pue Gorman, of Maryland; George G. Vest, of Missouri; Zebulon B. Vance, of North Carolina; John Sherman, of Ohio; and Isham G. Harris, of Tennessee. Among his colleagues in the House from Virginia were Charles T. O'Ferrall, later governor of the State; George D. Wise, William H. F. Lee, Paul C. Edmunds, and John A. Buchanan, of Abingdon.

For four years of the first eight years of Mr. TUCKER's service in the House he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. This committee was then handling critical matters in our foreign relations. Upon Mr. TUCKER's return in 1922, he was placed upon the Committee on Education which was the only vacancy then existing. Mr. TUCKER was peculiarly qualified for this work by experience and training, for while he was out of Congress he had been engaged in educational work, and he had canvassed Virginia as the agent of the Southern Educational Association in behalf of an improved school system in the State. In this way Mr. TUCKER contributed materially to the splendid progress made in education in Virginia during recent years.

Soon after Mr. TUCKER returned to Congress in 1922, the Congress recognized the need for his experience and legal attainments and qualifications in the work of the Committee on the Judiciary. Accordingly, though the committee consisted of its full complement, the Congress adopted a resolution enlarging the committee membership for the sole purpose of creating a place on the committee for Mr. TUCKER, and he served with distinction on this committee until the time of his death.

Mr. TUCKER was identified with the political life of Virginia from his earliest manhood until his death. Though unsuccessful in his efforts in 1909 and again in 1921 to secure the Democratic nomination for the office of governor of that State, he numbered his friends by the thousands, and those who had once become his friends never forgot him. He radiated comradeship, good cheer, happiness, and sunshine wherever he went, and his political campaigns were always of the highest order. He disdained the wiles of the politician; and the frank, manly statement of his position on all public matters won for him friends by the thousands, who were willing always to follow where he led.

Mr. TUCKER's services were so great, his life so useful, his talents so many, and his personal charm so indescribable that the limitations of a sketch such as this afford no opportunity to touch all the high points.

If called upon to name the outstanding quality in Mr. TUCKER's political life, I should answer without hesitation that it was his political courage. He never compromised a principle. He never truckled to expediency. He stood always foursquare to every wind that blew, and planted himself immovably upon the Constitution of this country.

His political courage and refusal to sacrifice principle to expediency received the acid test in 1896 when the Democratic Party espoused the cause of free silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. The nomination was Mr. TUCKER's if he would accept it upon the terms of voting for free silver. Mr. TUCKER refused to accept upon those terms and lost the nomination. Mr. TUCKER stood by his party but refused to sacrifice his principles.

While in Congress during the last period of his service, the salaries of Members of Congress were increased to take effect at the beginning of the next fiscal year. True to his conviction that Congress should not increase the salaries of Members during the term for which they had been elected, he refused to accept this increase in salary for the remainder of the term, but returned it to the Treasury. In doing this he followed the example set in 1816 by his illustrious grandfather of the same name.

During the period of Mr. TUCKER's service in Congress he was the author of the seventeenth amendment which provided for the election of United States Senators by the people, and of the bill known as the "Tucker bill," which repealed all Federal statutes which interfered with elections in the States. These laws had been enacted after the War between the States.

Mr. TUCKER rendered national service of the highest order as President of the Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition, succeeding in that position Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, whose death at the critical period of preparation seriously threatened the celebration. President Roosevelt appointed Mr. TUCKER as General Lee's successor, and the exposition was successfully held under his direction and supervision.

Mr. TUCKER married in 1877 Miss Henrietta Preston Johnston, who died in 1900, and there survived him by this marriage three sons and three daughters—John Randolph Tucker, of Richmond; Mrs. Rosa Johnston Mason, of Lexington; Maj. Albert Sidney Johnston Tucker, of the United States Army; Mrs. Laura Powell Fletcher, wife of Prof. Forest Fletcher, of Lexington; Harry St. George Tucker, of Lexington, Ky.; and Mrs. Henrietta Preston White, wife of Dr. T. Preston White, of Charlotte, N. C.

In 1903 Mr. TUCKER married Miss Martha Sharpe, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., who died February 18, 1928, and on June 26, 1929, he married Miss Mary Jane Williams, of Culpeper, Va., who survived him.

Mr. TUCKER was an orator of ability and a political speaker of peculiar force. His services were in frequent demand, and his speeches were remembered and quoted long after they had been delivered.

Mr. TUCKER was one of the happiest mortals who ever lived. He was always sustained by a beautiful Christian faith. Hatred, animosity, and revenge found no place in his life.

He was always full of humor and good cheer. He loved mankind, and he was loved by his fellow men. His life was an inspiration to all who knew him. His death left a void which can not be filled.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the seat of HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER is vacant! Who among us is so bold as to dare to fill it?

But yesterday he stood among us unraveling the perplexities of the Constitution. To-day he dwells in that land where men do not need constitutions and rules of law to circumscribe their action.

To him the transition meant few changes, because he lived among the higher altitudes of fellowship and brotherly love while here among men. I know that he is in congenial company, because he carried with him a pure heart attuned to the heart throbs of the heavenly throng.

We respect men, we admire men, but only one now and then in the teeming millions do we love. Men not only respected and admired but sincerely loved HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER.

I am not given to hero worship. Most would-be heroes when contacted become idols of clay. Mr. TUCKER was not my hero; he was my comrade. I was drawn to him not by adoration but by that indefinable human element he possessed that told me that I was a welcome guest into his fellowship and comradeship. He drew men to him because they found him to be a lover of men. He had a heart as well as a mind.

A great statesman, yes; but there was something about him bigger than statecraft. A great orator, yes; but there was something about him more persuasive than eloquence. A great constitutionalist, yes; but there was something about him more human than legal canons. A great lawyer, yes; but there was something about him more sympathetic than man-made rules of action. A great scholar, yes; but there was something about him more enlightening than erudition. A great teacher, yes; but there was something about him more instructive than pedagogy. A great conversationalist, yes; but there was something about him more charming than mere talk. A great host, yes; but there was something about him more elegant than manners. That something, my colleagues, was his love for his fellow men.

When in his presence I never thought of him as a great statesman, or a great orator, or a great lawyer, or a great teacher, or a great scholar, because he had none of the egotist or braggart about him to remind me of such things. I only thought of him as a lovable man, deeply interested in my welfare, eager to serve me in every way, ever ready to lend a helping hand.

Virginia has produced many men in the past of whom she is proud: Statesmen who climbed to the highest heights; orators who swayed the multitude by the enchantment of their words; judges whose decisions have become a part of our legal lore; lawyers whose reasoning and logic commanded the respect of our highest tribunals; doctors who healed as if by the magic of their touch; scholars whose learning astounded the learned; teachers who instilled into the minds of the young that it takes more than erudition to make men; preachers who inspired men to lead higher, nobler lives; but on the scroll of her immortals the name of HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER leads the list of those who loved their fellow men.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, words are inadequate to properly express the affection and regard of Members of Congress and those who knew him, of the life, character, and achievements of HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER.

His kindly smile and hearty greeting inspired confidence and affection for him and always left one with the distinct impression of peace and admiration, such as is inspired by the view of a snow-capped mountain.

Never did the Members of Congress hear from him on the floor of the House biased or partisan utterances, but his great ability was reserved for the discussion of national questions of importance, to which he contributed invaluable information and thought.

The Constitution of the United States was his shield and buckler, and his flashing eye and vigorous delivery even in his advancing years reminded one of the effect of the bugle call on the aged hunter when the Constitution was in danger.

It is inspiring to contemplate the fact that Virginia and the country still produces men like HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER. The safety and happiness of our State and our country lies in the vision, loyalty, patriotism, and character of men like him. In a commercial age, when so many are swept away by fleeting affairs of the moment and lose their perspective in frivolous and unessential things, HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER stood out among his fellow men like a mighty oak in the forest.

His life and character, like the ruins of the majestic Acropolis, should be a constant reminder to us he has left behind of the grandeur that was Athens and the glory that was Rome.

J. CHARLES LINTHICUM

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, under the privilege granted of extending my remarks, I desire to pay my respects in a few words to my friend and associate the Hon. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM.

Mr. LINTHICUM was chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House at the time of his death, having been a member of that committee for many years. For the past eight years I have served with him on that committee and I had an opportunity to see and know his interest in public affairs and his conscientious duty in trying to perform those duties. Being ranking member of this committee for many years he was responsible to a great extent for much of the important legislation that came from that committee. He was responsible for the bill, which came out of that committee and was finally passed, for the reclassification of consuls and vice consuls, and defining their duties. He was greatly responsible for the building program of embassies throughout the world. Being ranking Democrat of this committee, he was a member of the Buildings Commission and visited many of the countries where these buildings were to be located and aided in the purchase of the different sites, and many of these buildings throughout the world stand to-day as a monument to his aid in securing the same. After he became chairman of the committee he was more than interested in his work; was kind and considerate to all members of the committee, and on account of this had, to a great extent, the cooperation of his committee.

He was a man of intelligence, sober, industrious, and honest, and did his best toward passing that character of legislation that he thought was in the interest of the people of this country.

He was very much opposed to the eighteenth amendment, and during last session of Congress had submitted to that Congress what is known as the Beck-Linthicum resolution, which had for its purpose repeal of the eighteenth amendment. At that time it failed by a large vote, but I have often thought how happy he would have been could he have witnessed the passage of a similar resolution during this session of Congress, which he had for so many years advocated. While Mr. LINTHICUM advocated from principle the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, yet he told me that he never took a drink.

I admired Mr. LINTHICUM very much; his ability, his courtesy, and his great effort to accomplish those things that he thought were in the interest of his people.

I was very much shocked at his death, not knowing at the time that he was in any wise seriously afflicted.

In his passing many hearts were saddened and the people lost a most splendid Representative.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, J. CHARLES LINTHICUM was for many years the dean of the Maryland delegation in the House of Representatives, and since the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress was chairman of the very important Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives.

The first time I came into intimate contact with CHARLEY LINTHICUM was during the war, when on two occasions he came down on the Eastern Shore of Maryland for the purpose of assisting in raising funds for various war services.

I had met him before when he served in the Maryland senate with my brother, but I became intimate with him during the war, and ever since have looked upon him as a very near and dear friend.

Although for many years Charley was afflicted with a physical malady which prevented his taking very much nourishing food, two things were to be noted about him: First, he never spoke about anybody except in the kindest way; and, second, I have never seen him irritated or impatient.

As the Baltimore Sun said about him in a beautiful editorial, written shortly after his death, "He had a way of life."

Mr. LINTHICUM had perfectly legitimate ambitions to be Governor of Maryland and to be United States Senator from Maryland, and although conditions were never such that he was able to achieve his ambition, he was never known to accuse anyone of unfairness or double dealing.

He worked hard, he worked conscientiously, he did everything in his power to secure legitimate ends, but if his efforts did not turn out exactly as he would have liked them, he never lost his poise or serenity, and was never made bitter.

CHARLEY LINTHICUM had a fine sense of values in his estimate of legislation and was able to reach a conclusion about his own attitude on legislation with a remarkable facility.

His domestic life was ideal, and his devotion to his wife and the members of his family was apparent to all of his associates.

It is not given to us to understand the meaning of our birth, the meaning of our life, and the meaning of our death, but when I think of CHARLEY LINTHICUM now, I see him as he was at his desk in the committee room of Foreign Affairs, serene, courtly, modest, and tactful—truly a fine figure.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, the life of the Hon. JOHN CHARLES LINTHICUM, long a Representative from the State of Maryland in Congress, was one well spent in public and private efforts. Two centuries ago his progenitors settled in Anne Arundel County, where they took an early and conspicuous part in the development of the agricultural and cultured life of that county. From these ancestors he inherited those charming traits of gentleness and consideration for others which are the unfailing characteristics of those whom nature has set aside as cast in a different mold.

Born within a few years after the unfortunate conflict within the Union, that conflict left its mark upon the fortunes of many families in the South and the border States, and his own family did not escape some of these adversities. Thus his early life was marked by self-denial and sacrifice, which gave him a strength of character and self-reliance which rarely come to those whom circumstances have placed in a different rôle. He knew privation, if not want; he was early to realize that in the main he would be compelled to be the architect of his own fortune.

During an apprenticeship spent in selling produce from door to door to help out the family fortunes, he attended the public schools in Baltimore, and afterwards the State normal school, from which he graduated in 1886 at the age of 19. For a short time he taught in the public schools of Anne Arundel County, and afterwards served as principal of the Braddock Heights School in Frederick County, in his State of Maryland.

His ambition was to become a lawyer and to broaden his knowledge by study and application. He found the opportunity during his vocation as a teacher to read law, and at the same time enrolled as a special student in political economy and history at the Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. He graduated from the University of Maryland Law School in 1890, and from then until the time of his death he engaged in the practice of law in Baltimore and in extensive real-estate developments in Anne Arundel County. Perhaps his chief pride and interest, aside from his happy married life and political achievements, were in the development of the very beautiful township in Anne Arundel County, known as Linthicum Heights, where in the decades long since past his family had tilled the soil and which land to him was a heritage to be nourished and cared for so that the honored name of his family would not perish.

But political life was one which appealed to him most, and in which he found an outlet for his ability and fine qualities of heart and mind. After a term in the House of Delegates of Maryland, he served two terms—1905–1910—in the State Senate of Maryland before being elected to the Sixty-second Congress of the United States, where he had a continuous service from March 4, 1911, to the date of his untimely death on October 5, 1932, a period of more than 21 years.

It was in the Congress of the United States that he showed real statesmanship and an untiring devotion to his public duties unexcelled by any of his contemporaries. Perhaps the chief satisfaction he had from his long and honorable career as a Congressman was when he succeeded to the chairmanship of the influential and important Foreign Affairs Committee, of which he had been an outstanding and conspicuous member for many years. In that committee he found his most congenial work, and a work for which he was eminently fitted by training, adaptability, and study. No one in or out of Congress worked more earnestly, assiduously, and successfully for the establishment of suitable homes in foreign countries for our ambassadors and ministers than did Congressman LINTHICUM, and through his efforts as a member of that committee, and through the social contacts of his wife and himself with the representatives of foreign governments in Washington, he did much to preserve for this country the friendship of and cordial relations with the nations of the world. He and his devoted wife were extensive travelers, and found the opportunity, in a very busy life, to frequently visit the capitals of Europe and Asia, but perhaps one of his most delightful trips was that made by him and his wife but a few weeks before his death to the Dominican Republic, where he was the honored guest of the President of that Republic.

There was a time when he cherished an ambition to be mayor of Baltimore and later to be Governor of the State of Maryland, and it was only through the clipping of the threads by fate that he was not called on to occupy the executive mansion at Annapolis. For a period of 8 or 10 years there was never a time when he was not frequently mentioned as being among the few men available by training and experience for the governorship of his State. If he ever felt any disappointment over the fact that the exigencies of a complicated political situation deprived him of this honor, he never showed it in speech or action, and always accepted the decision of his party with the calmness, resignation, and equanimity which were some of his outstanding traits. Whatever may have been his inner disappointment in not becoming governor of his State, that disappointment must have quickly vanished in the knowledge that his congressional life was one which brought him great distinction and the respect and friendship of his colleagues during his long and honorable service.

One would not be justified, it seems, in saying he was endowed with a brilliant mind. A truer picture would be to remember him as he was, a man with a clear, concise, and well-balanced mind, and one who used his admirable qualities in devoted service to his State and Nation, and whose reward came in the recognition that he was a man to be admired and respected and emulated.

As he lived, so he died—in peace and harmony with his Maker and his fellow men, and his memory will long be remembered by those who were privileged to know him.

The poet says:

Fate oft tears the bosom cords
That finest nature strung;
Omnipotence alone can heal the wound that came;
Can point the grief-worn eyes
To scenes beyond the pale.

And so it is with our friend and colleague, we shall look beyond the pale.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, gone is our friend, our comrade, our faithful and competent public servant, who, having performed his part upon life's stage, moves on.

It is indeed with a heart filled with sadness that I add my tribute of affection and respect to those similar expressions of my colleagues, called forth in honor of the memory of Hon. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, with whom I was associated for so many years on the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives.

The passing of any valued public man is a misfortune. The loss of J. CHARLES LINTHICUM to his country is a tragedy.

My personal relations with him were of a peculiarly intimate, and friendly nature. Not alone as a colleague in the House of Representatives, not alone as the chairman of the great Committee on Foreign Affairs do I mourn his loss.

The close intimacies of the common effort of Members of Congress make for friendships based upon respect and recognition of the finest elements of human character.

By every test of such friendships Mr. LINTHICUM measured to the full stature of a man.

It is therefore with an unusual depth of feeling that I here express my humble tribute to this great and good man. He will always live in the hearts of those with whom he was associated. To them he needs no other monument. The influence which he exerted out of his wide experience, sound judgment, and inflexible character will live on in the structure of our Government. His personality is the heritage which will be ever treasured in the memory of his friends and associates.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, JOHN CHARLES LINTHICUM, familiarly known to his many friends as "Charley," and especially so to his colleagues in Congress, was born at Linthicum Heights, Anne Arundell County, November 26, 1867, and died October 5, 1932. He received his early education in the public schools and in 1886 graduated from the State Normal School. Immediately thereafter he took up his chosen profession and became principal of Braddock School, in Frederick County, and later taught in his native county, Anne Arundell.

Mr. LINTHICUM returned to Baltimore City, where he attended Johns Hopkins University and finally entered the University of Maryland School of Law, from which he obtained his degree of LL.B. in 1890 and since that time has practiced law in the city of Baltimore. Serving in the House of Delegates and in the State Senate of the Maryland Legislature, needless to say with credit to himself and the people of Baltimore whom he represented, he was then selected by one of the leading congressional districts of the country to serve in the Sixty-second Congress, and from that time till the date of his death he was returned to each succeeding Congress, presenting as it did one of the longest uninterrupted terms of service enjoyed by those elected to the popular branch of the Congress.

The beautiful eulogies presented by Congressman MCCORMACK and Congressman DAVENPORT at the memorial exercises held by the House on February 17, 1932, could easily be accepted as an individual tribute to Mr. LINTHICUM, for each word they uttered was fully applicable to him.

Few men have represented Maryland in any capacity, certainly as a public servant, in a more faithful and helpful way than did our good friend Mr. LINTHICUM. From the very beginning of his service in the National Congress he took an active interest in international and national problems along with those local subjects which were for solution by the Federal Government. His devotion to the high position this country should occupy throughout the world caused his early assignment to the Foreign Affairs Committee, and after years of outstanding service on that committee, became its chairman, in which capacity he was serving at the time of his death. In many foreign countries, where our foreign relations are established through ambassadors or other representatives, housing facilities in keeping with the dignity of the station one expects this Government to maintain, in many, many instances stand as a monument to the initiative, determination, and decision of Mr. LINTHICUM, for it was his privilege to represent the United States in this important work.

Thirteen years ago, when the eighteenth amendment became part of the organic law of our country, it was not a popular thing for Senators and Representatives to advocate its repeal. Congressman LINTHICUM, sensing not only the feeling of the intelligent constituency he had, but following the dictates of his own conscience, helped to organize and became one of the small group which started almost immediately the movement to repeal this law and to restore the Constitution of the United States to those limitations and fundamentals of government it was at all times intended.

Shortly before his death—that is, in the spring of 1932—the large vote in the House upon his resolution to repeal the eighteenth amendment showed the tremendous good which had been done during the intervening years, and should also show the very telling effect of the helpful, appealing campaign Mr. LINTHICUM and others had presented to the country. It is too bad he could not have lived to have seen the victory which came to us a few weeks ago, and for which he, ahead of almost any man in Congress to-day, would have received the plaudits and congratulations of the people for bringing about.

No one can think of Mr. LINTHICUM without connecting in the same thought the effort and tireless energy he displayed in behalf of Maryland, especially Baltimore city. It was short of an obsession with him that Baltimore Harbor should be second to none in the country, and he labored day in and day out to obtain appropriations and decisions helpful to that purpose. The new post office in Baltimore, the new marine hospital, the new appraiser's store about to be constructed, the protection of Fort McHenry, and numerous other matters, all found Mr. LINTHICUM in the lead with the Maryland delegation to persuade and convince Congress as to the necessity for these additions to the beauty and upbuilding of Baltimore. It was a happy day in his life, when after many years of effort, the Congress by resolution recognized the Star-Spangled Banner as the national anthem of our country.

Mrs. Linthicum's devotion to him was a matter of knowledge to all of his friends in the House. Their home was open to all of us, and the hospitality of that home which most of us enjoyed will live in our memories for all time.

If I could continue, as I could for a long time, to eulogize Mr. LINTHICUM, I could do, as I have said, nothing better than to repeat the beautiful language to be found in the memorial addresses referred to. All I care, therefore, to say further is that we miss CHARLEY LINTHICUM more than mere words can express, and my own great State has lost a faithful, true, and able Representative in the National Congress.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, to eulogize on the life of a man who was so greatly loved, and so highly revered, as the late Congressman J. CHARLES LINTHICUM, is indeed a difficult task—in that his many good deeds, his untiring effort in behalf of those whom he represented, and his deep understanding of the human heart would, in the telling, fall far short of conveying the true definition and magnanimity of his ideals and standards. Words would be mere symbols in the description of his many and untiring efforts, to accomplish the favorable results, which he attained.

However, I wish to say, briefly, that it was my great pleasure to have served the same legislative district in the Senate of the State of Maryland, which had been previously represented by the late Congressman; and I am further honored to be serving at this time the same Congressional district of Maryland which he so ably represented in Congress for more than 20 years. His high ideals and principles have always borne out the traditions of the State of Maryland and will serve as an inspiration to those Representatives who may follow in his footsteps.

Mr. LINTHICUM's life was one of steady step and development. He was the son of the late Sweetser Linthicum, and his mother, before her marriage, was Laura E. Smith. Until the time Mr. LINTHICUM was 12 years of age he lived on the parental farm at Linthicum Heights, Md.; he came to Baltimore in the year of 1879, where he attended the public schools of that city. At a very early age he became a wage earner, but, aspiring to become a teacher, he entered the State normal school and was graduated in 1886, at the age of 19 years. He taught for a while and later, in 1887, became principal of the Braddock School in Frederick County, later entering Johns Hopkins University to major in a course of political economy and history. In 1890 he was graduated from the Maryland Law School and admitted to the Maryland State bar in April of the same year. He was then elected to the House of Delegates of the State of Maryland and thereafter to the State Senate.

Based on the high tributes of his great knowledge and human understanding, he was then elected to the Sixty-second Congress, and through his unfaltering effort, his fidelity, and sincere devotion to the interests of his constituents, he represented Maryland in Congress longer than any other man in the history of the State.

Though CHARLES LINTHICUM has left us, his high traditions and loyalty to the ideals in which he so sincerely believed are left as standards by which we who follow may be guided.

He was truly beloved and served Congress and his people long and well.

CHARLES A. KARCH

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to know CHARLES A. KARCH intimately for more than 20 years. During that time he was my friend, and I his. No greater thing can come to any man in this world than friendship. It is the only treasure worth coveting.

We started our public careers together as members of the house and senate in the Illinois Legislature. The public service that Charley rendered in that body was so progressive that the most progressive of all Presidents recognized him and honored him by appointment as district attorney for the eastern district of Illinois. CHARLES A. KARCH reflected honor upon that appointment as he did upon every public office that he held. When it became apparent to him that justice was not prevailing in the Federal court of his jurisdiction he boldly attacked the sitting judge and with such telling effect that the House of Representatives voted an impeachment. The judge subsequently resigned to avoid trial.

In 1930 the people of the twenty-second congressional district of Illinois sent him to represent them in the Congress. His service here was a repetition of all of his other public service, progressive and in the interest of the poor. He was fortunate in his opportunity to serve his people in both his State and his Nation during critical times. It is probable that he regarded his labor in the Seventy-second Congress as his most important public work. The work of that Congress was months of labor, without a day of recreation and without an hour of leisure. The RECORD will show to future generations the wisdom with which he approached the questions of his time.

Throughout his long public career he exhibited a character replete with that strong moral fiber that makes men great among their fellows.

The sense of personal grief which oppresses those of us who knew him well is overshadowed by the conviction that his untimely death was a public calamity, the extent of which can not now be measured by words of eulogy. For what he has done for his fellow man his place in our hearts is secure; he has the respect and affection of us all.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to pay a short tribute of respect to our departed friend, the Hon. CHARLES A. KARCH, of the twenty-second Illinois district, and to comment briefly on his life, character, and public service.

He was of a pioneer family, residents of St. Clair County, Ill., for almost a hundred years. Born and reared on a farm near Fayettesville, Ill., educated in the public schools, the State Normal University, and the Wesleyan Law College at Bloomington, Ill., he was well prepared and equipped for the useful and active life he led. He taught school for several years and became actively engaged in the practice of law. He was an able lawyer and enjoyed an extensive and lucrative practice.

He was elected to the lower house of the State legislature, and served with distinction in the forty-fourth, forty-seventh, and forty-eighth sessions of the General Assembly of Illinois. He was appointed United States district attorney by President Wilson, and served from 1914 to 1918. His training and experience peculiarly fitted him for the duties and responsibilities devolving upon Members of this body. He was nominated by the Democratic Party of his district and elected to the Seventy-second Congress in November, 1930. He was renominated by his party in April, 1932, and his reelection to the Seventy-third Congress was assured. He passed away just two days before the general election in November, 1932.

By his death the country has been deprived of an able legislator and his community of a leading spirit in civic and community affairs. It can be truly said of him that those who knew him best loved him most. All with whom he came in contact held him in the highest esteem. The news of his untimely death on November 6, 1932, came as a distinct shock to the people of his community and to his colleagues in this House.

While here but a short time, he had demonstrated his usefulness and ability as a legislator and as a true friend to the people of his district and the country. Of pleasing personality and address, with a background of training and experience, energetic and industrious, endowed with a splendid intellect, he was destined to become a leader in this body. We all mourn his passing, and I desire to record these few words in the permanent records of this House as a slight token of my affection and respect for him and of his life, character, and worth as a public servant.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. Speaker, it is with something more than a feeling of perfunctory interest that I rise to add a brief tribute of respect to the memory of CHARLES A. KARCH, for he was not only an honored colleague but a warm personal friend for whom I entertained great affection.

CHARLES A. KARCH was born in Engelmann Township, St. Clair County, in Illinois on March 17, 1875. He attended the public schools of his immediate vicinity and later the Northern Illinois Normal University, where he prepared himself for the profession of teaching. After having taught school among his neighbors for several years he enrolled in a course of law at Wesleyan College in Bloomington, Ill., from which he was later graduated. Immediately upon his graduation he began the practice of law and continued to do so until the time of his death, occupying a position of preeminence in the Illinois bar. His love of country and its traditions and ideals always made him carry on in the interest of the underprivileged. He served for three terms as a member of the lower house of the Illinois Legislature and was United States District Attorney for the eastern district of Illinois during the national administration of Woodrow Wilson. It was during the time he occupied this position that he became opponent of Judge English of that Federal district and is given the credit by people acquainted with the facts with being responsible for the ousting of the said Federal judge after impeachment proceedings had been proposed. In 1926 he became attorney for the United Mine Workers of America and represented this organization up to the time of his death. He was elected to the Seventy-second Congress by the citizens of the twenty-second district of Illinois and in 1932 again received the renomination to the Seventy-third Congress by the largest majority ever given any congressional candidate in that district, but it had to be otherwise and he died at his home in East St. Louis on the 6th day of December, 1932, two days prior to his general election, leaving to mourn his death Mrs. Karch and one daughter, Miss Marguerite.

He was a man of the highest intelligence and sound judgment, with a large amount of energy that he would use in the interest of the people of his district and the Nation. He rarely spoke before the House of Representatives, but when he did it was useful and intelligent information that he would give his colleagues.

God bless the one whose day is done;
God save us all, till we
May have it said when we are dead
We lived as well as he.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, putting our thoughts in language that will properly express our feelings toward departed friends is, indeed, a difficult task. To pay fitting tribute to our departed colleague and statesman, CHARLES A. KARCH, is doubly difficult, because his passing is a loss not only to his family and friends but is a loss to his district, to the State of Illinois, and to the Nation.

It was not my pleasure to be long associated with him personally, but I knew CHARLIE KARCH by the record he had made in the General Assembly of Illinois and as a prosecutor as district attorney for the United States Eastern District. Having served three terms in the Illinois Legislature, the latter term under the administration of Governor Edward F. Dunne, where he was chairman of the committee on judiciary and floor leader of the Democratic Party, he came to the National Congress endowed with rare ability and experience to represent the twenty-second congressional district of Illinois. As a practicing attorney he was long identified with the labor movement and gave much of his time and energies gratis to helping build labor organization.

By environment and training CHARLIE KARCH was essentially a progressive. His public service not only in the Congress, but for a quarter of a century prior to his election to this body, was of a progressive nature. Although his service here was of short duration, he took an active part in the debates and introduced several bills touching labor and prohibition, which showed the liberal views he held.

No Congressman worked harder or more diligently for the benefit of his constituency than did CHARLIE KARCH. No doubt he regarded his labor in this Congress the most important of his public service. No Congress in history had more important decisions to make and held longer months of labor, without recreation and leisure, than the Congress of which he was a Member. It can, probably truthfully, be said that his long and continuous labor had its effect on his health and no doubt shortened his days among us.

As a friend and colleague he was delightful, warmhearted, responsive, loyal, and generous. He was one of those rare men blessed with the qualities of both heart and intellect which make men both love and admire them. In a long public career he exhibited a character filled with strong moral stamina which can not be expressed by words of eulogy. Such a life well spent in the service of his country endears him in our affections. Peace to his memory be.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to know the late Hon. CHARLES A. KARCH for many years prior to his election to Congress, when he was serving as the floor leader of his party in the Illinois Assembly. Then, as later, his sincerity, sense of fair play, perseverance, and cheerfulness, and his espousel of the cause of the "plain, common man" endeared him to all who knew him.

He was a man of great legal attainments, but a greater public servant; loyal, fearless, and true to the great trust placed in him by the people of his district and State.

During his brief term in Congress he served his district, State, and Nation unselfishly and nobly. Those who had the privilege to work shoulder to shoulder with him shall always cherish the memory of his scholarly attainments and the charm of his simple, unaffected manner.

His knowledge of history and his broad background made him an important member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, on which he served with distinction.

Though the loss to his family is great, the loss to the Nation is irreparable, for in him it has lost not only a valued citizen and an honorable man, but an eminent legislator and a great humanitarian. It is with profound regret and sorrow that I bid my friend Godspeed on the long journey to his Maker.

The following is the address of Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, at the funeral of Hon. CHARLES A. KARCH, deceased, Evangelical Church, East St. Louis, Ill., November 9, 1932:

A farm boy, a printer, a school-teacher, secretary to a Member of Congress, a practicing attorney, floor leader of his party in the Illinois House of Representatives, United States district attorney for the eastern district of Illinois, attorney for railroad shopmen, chief counsel for the United Mine Workers of America, a Member of Congress; this is a brief outline of the busy, useful life of Hon. CHARLES A. KARCH, whose body lies here to-day.

A short time ago his colleagues in the House of Representatives bade him adieu and good luck, and we all expected to-day to be sending him letters congratulating him upon his reelection to Congress yesterday, but we are now here standing at his bier.

Throughout his useful life of service he sympathized always with the toilers and those in the humbler positions of life. Absolute fairness characterized always his treatment in his legislative career of all ranks of life.

The progress of nations depends upon the men who walk in cool furrows amid the rustling corn, upon the man whose face is glowing with the blazing fires of great furnaces, upon the men who delve in mines, upon the writers and brave thinkers, upon the man who fills the wintry air with the musical ringing of his ax. I have enumerated the classes with whom he sympathized and worked.

There is no death. The stars go down, but they rise on another shore. The leaves may wither and fall and the flowers fade, but they only await the warm breath of spring. In his garden of sleep he merely waits for the living.

He could always win or lose a race with perfect self-control. He was always a man in a world of men.

I like to think of life always as a journey over a broad highway. We start out when the road is wet with last night's rain, accompanied by the young, always walking and struggling and fighting for the crest which is above us, but when we reach it there comes the call of another crest, and when we reach that there is still the call of another and a higher crest. The road is narrowing now. The companions of our journey are fewer than they were when we started, but the race goes always to those who have the faculty of remaining young.

As we journey along there are cool places where the tall ferns grow, places of rest, and CHARLIE KARCH knew when to rest and how to rest. And then there is always a song somewhere if you can hear it. There is the song of the lark when the skies are clear, and he always heard it. There is the song of the thrush when the skies are gray, and he always listened for it and he always heard it. His was a bright, cheerful disposition always.

Along the road there are meadows where dreams come true. He found them often. My colleagues from the Senate and the House of Representatives who are here have found them, and so have I, and so have all of you. CHARLIE KARCH found them many times.

And there are fields where the 4-leafed clovers grow. They are the prizes of this life. CHARLIE KARCH found them often and my colleagues who are here have found them. I have found them and so have all of you, but you must wait and you must watch and you must work.

Finally there comes the call of the last crest of all; it is the call which comes from beyond the stars. It comes to some early in life. It comes to others, as in the case of CHARLIE KARCH, while the sun is still high in the heavens, but it always comes, and we slip our anchors and sail away over unknown seas to "the beautiful Isle of Somewhere" where anchored lie the craft of those of our friends who have gone before.

If all for whom CHARLIE KARCH rendered a kindly act during his journey through this life should to-night drop a flower upon his grave he would sleep beneath a wilderness of roses.

May the winds of winter blow soft where he lies. May the snows of winter lie light on his grave, and over his last resting place may the birds sing their sweetest songs during the long, sunny, summer days to come.

Good night, old friend, good night.

JAMES C. M'LAUGHLIN

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the biographical sketch of our late colleague, JAMES C. MCLAUGHLIN, as it appears in the Biographical Directory of the American Congress, is as follows:

JAMES CAMPBELL MCLAUGHLIN, a Representative from Michigan; born in Beardstown, Cass County, Ill., January 26, 1858; moved to Muskegon, Mich., in 1864; attended the public schools of Muskegon and the academic department of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor; was graduated from the law department of this institution in 1883; was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice at Muskegon, Mich., in 1883; prosecuting attorney of Muskegon County 1887–1901; in 1901 appointed by the Governor of Michigan as a member of the board of State tax commissioners and State board of assessors, in the latter capacity taking part in the first assessment of railroad property of the State for taxation, and served until 1906; elected as a Republican to the Sixtieth and to the nine succeeding Congresses (March 4, 1907–March 3, 1927). Reelected to the Seventieth Congress. [Since the publication of this directory he was reelected to the Seventy-first and Seventy-second Congresses.]

He died, suddenly, in his room in a hotel in Marion, Va., on the morning of November 29, 1932, while he was on his way from his home in Muskegon, Mich., to Washington to attend the opening session of Congress in December. Had he lived until the expiration of his term March 3, 1933, he would have served continuously in this body for 13 terms, or a period of 26 years, a service longer than any other one has ever had in the House of Representatives from the State of Michigan since it was admitted to the Union and surpassed or equalled by comparatively few from any State in the history of the Government. He was a Republican, but during the major part of this time he was elected by his district without opposition, either in his own or the Democratic Party. At the time of his death he was, and for a number of years had been, dean of the Michigan delegation in the House.

I first became acquainted with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN about 30 years ago, when he was a member of the State board of assessors and engaged in the work of assessing the railroad property of the State. He won my admiration for the courage, fidelity to duty, and ability which he displayed in that work under trying circumstances. He had a high sense of duty and the courage to act as his sense of duty and his judgment dictated. My respect and admiration for him increased with the years as our association and acquaintance became more intimate.

For many years he was a prominent member of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and came to be recognized as an authority on agricultural questions. Upon the retirement from Congress of Joseph W. Fordney, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN succeeded him as the Michigan member of the great Committee on Ways and Means of the House.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN was a man of the highest character and integrity, a careful student of legislation, and an influential Member of the House. He commanded the respect and admiration and had the confidence of his colleagues as well as of everyone with whom he came in contact. He was faithful and conscientious in the discharge of every duty and devoted himself to the best interests of his district and of his country. Independent and able, the controlling motive of his public service was to do what was right and for the public good. After he had satisfied himself on these points, nothing could swerve him from his purpose to act accordingly. He exemplified the highest type of public servant.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in paying tribute to the memory of my late colleague and fellow Member from Michigan, the Hon. JAMES C. MCLAUGHLIN. Throughout his long and distinguished career of public service, he gave himself unstintingly in the performance of his many and arduous duties and his sterling character and outstanding ability won for him the esteem and respect of all with whom he came in contact.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN was born in Beardstown, Ill., January 26, 1858, moving to Muskegon, Mich., six years later, where he received his education in the public schools, later attending the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, where he studied law. After devoting several years to private practice as an attorney, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN launched into his public career as prosecuting attorney for Muskegon County in 1887. He served in various other public positions until his election to the Sixtieth Congress, serving continuously until his demise during the last session of the Seventy-second Congress.

It has been my privilege to associate and work with him during nearly half of the quarter century he spent within the Halls of Congress. His sudden death came as a great shock to his own people and to his host of friends throughout the State and the Nation. His life was marked by his worthy achievements and his name will long be remembered as that of one who wrought much and well for the district in which he lived and the State and Nation to whom he devoted his life.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, the death of Hon. JAMES C. MCLAUGHLIN, for 26 years Representative from the ninth district of Michigan, takes from public life and service one of the best men Michigan has sent to this House. His long span of service, in which he served under Presidents Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, is a record of faithful service to country and constituents. Of sturdy Scotch descent, he combined with his ancestral virtues an unbounded admiration for and belief in American institutions.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN had served his locality and State in various capacities before coming to Congress. He was recognized as a lawyer of exceptional ability in Michigan. When he came to Congress, however, he abandoned all clients but his constituency and gave unsparingly of his time and ability to the service of the country. His unfailing kindness to younger Members is one of the outstanding traits which will be long remembered by many of the present Members of the House.

During the whole course of his life I doubt whether the integrity of any act or thought of Mr. MCLAUGHLIN'S was seriously questioned. Rugged honesty was of the very fiber of his being. He had the confidence and respect of Democrat and Republican alike, and he returned this feeling in full.

He was a stern and unbending Republican of the old school. He believed in party government and party discipline. His long service on the Ways and Means Committee was of exceptional value to the country.

His manly, kindly face will be missed in the House, and the cloakrooms and corridors will miss the brightness of his magnetic smile. But though he be dead, the sunny influence which his presence lent will be always with us, while the kindness of his generous heart and gallant nature can never be forgotten. Hundreds of loving friends who in the sunlight of his genial presence had learned to admire and love him—to love him for his manly characteristics, his nobleness of nature, his purity of heart, his deep affection—are overcome with that grief which silence, not language, can alone express.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, in the death of the Hon. JAMES C. MCLAUGHLIN this House lost one of its most respected and best beloved Members. For nearly 26 years he had represented his district in this body. There are but four of our Members whose service here exceeded his. This long, uninterrupted service was a testimonial of the affection for and confidence in him of the people whom he represented. That this feeling was amply justified is known to every Member to whom had been given the privilege of knowing and working with him.

For years Mr. MCLAUGHLIN had been the dean of the Michigan delegation in the House. We younger Members are under lasting obligations to our deceased colleague and friend for the always courteous, kindly advice and counsel given readily and freely. Out of his years of service here there grew a clear judgment of public questions and of men, rare even among those of long service in the Congress. It was this that contributed so largely to the value of his advice.

He was in every sense a national legislator. With him the welfare of the Nation as a whole outweighed the temporary welfare of any section or class. He was deliberate in reaching decisions, which once reached were immutable. He looked askance at anything even approaching a new order of things and was never so happy as when precedent could point the way.

He was a serious-minded, courteous gentleman of the old school. His standard of ethics was of the highest. His integrity and ability were unquestioned. In his death this House lost a valuable Member, and the State of Michigan lost a splendid citizen.

We are to-day writing the last chapter in the life of our distinguished colleague, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. The record we are making will soon be filed in the archives of the Nation as a public document to be reviewed by those who come after you and I are gone. Those who read the beautiful tributes that have been paid to his memory should be inspired by the thought that here was a man who always faithfully kept every trust imposed in him; one who always conducted himself in such a way as to merit the confidence and respect of all who knew him; and one who always followed the Golden Rule: "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

DANIEL E. GARRETT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the passing of DANIEL E. GARRETT brought sorrow to the entire membership of the House. For 16 years he served with honor and distinction as a member of this body.

Endowed by nature with a handsome and prepossessing personal appearance, a keen intellect, and a great heart, he built a character and a personality that left its imprint upon all who knew him.

The old-fashioned virtues of honesty and integrity were a part of the warp and woof of his very life. The principles of the Christian religion he loved and lived. He abhorred hypocrisy and deceit; and loyalty to his friends was one of his cardinal virtues. He loved humanity, and was never happier than when fighting for the cause of the poor and oppressed. The record of his votes cast upon measures in the House during his long service is abundant proof of this statement.

He was earnest, eloquent, and convincing in debate. Possessing a good stock of sound common sense, a fine judge of human nature, he could weigh measures and appraise men at their real worth.

Having a finely developed sense of humor, and being a charming conversationalist and a story-teller unexcelled, together with his spirit of optimism and hope, he dispelled gloom and brought joy into the hearts of the downcast and oppressed.

The world is brighter and better and happier because he lived. God bless and revere his memory.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, the death of DANIEL E. GARRETT removed from this House a man who served his people, his State, and his Nation well and faithfully for many years.

Mr. GARRETT was first sent to this House in 1912 as a Representative at large from Texas. He was returned here in 1916, and he represented the eighth Texas district from that time until his death.

He was closely associated with the late President Woodrow Wilson, and that great leader leaned heavily upon his counsel and assistance during the trying years of the war period. He was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the war Congress and served as chairman of the subcommittee which handled recommendations for appropriations for Army supplies. On the recommendations of that committee billions of dollars were appropriated for use during the war.

To that arduous work, as to all other tasks which were assigned him during his long and honorable service here, Mr. GARRETT applied his keen intellect, his devotion to duty, and his abiding patriotism.

The record of his votes here discloses his friendship for the veteran, the laborer, and the farmer. His entire life was spent in championing the cause of the oppressed, and he was a firm believer in the high principles upon which his political party was founded. In his congressional service, however, Mr. GARRETT did not attempt to single out one class of constituents for special consideration. His ideal was to render service to all, without discrimination, and his friends and colleagues all know how well he realized that ideal.

His death occasioned great sorrow not only in this House but throughout the State of Texas. The citizens of that State, and particularly of his district, have lost an able and conscientious public servant; they will forever be grateful for his achievements and honor his memory.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Speaker, after the passing of our beloved colleague and friend, the Hon. DANIEL E. GARRETT, the Houston, Tex., bar, of which he was a member, passed the following resolutions:

Whereas an all-wise Providence has removed from our midst our beloved friend and fellow citizen, DANIEL E. GARRETT, lawyer, statesman, and United States Congressman, representing our eighth congressional district: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the death of Congressman GARRETT, Texas lost one of its most loyal and capable public servants and Houston an outstanding, patriotic, and faithful citizen, ever diligent to promote the best interests of his adopted city and to champion the cause of good government.

PUBLIC SERVICE

That by his long life of public service, devotion to duty, and loyalty to his constituents, he earned for himself the well-merited respect, friendship, and affectionate esteem, not only of his intimate associates but of a host of admiring friends, whom he numbered by the thousands. In representing the people of his district, he served them all impartially and faithfully, regardless of their religion, political faith, or political friendship. He took the keenest interest in all legislation for the benefit of ex-service men, particularly the disabled, and for the men and women who toil. Up to the very last he aggressively fought the battles of the men who had been disabled in the service of their country, and his legislative record in behalf of laboring men and women is without a blemish.

That as a lawyer he was respected and revered by his fellow lawyers for his fidelity to his clients, his courtesy to bench and bar, and his zeal as an officer of the court in advocating substantial justice based upon common sense and right.

DEVOTED TO FAMILY

That in his home life he was a devoted husband and loving father. Among his family and friends one instantly realized the humanness and gentleness of the man and felt the charming hospitality and culture of the old South. Those very close to him never heard him make an unclean utterance in the presence of his household nor tell the most slightly suggestive story in the presence of a lady. He was a sincerely religious man, and in his last illness he expressed profound faith in immortality.

That as a man and citizen he was noble in life, always actuated by the highest and most honorable motives, true to his convictions and every trust imposed upon him, uncompromising in what he believed to be right, a staunch advocate and champion of democracy, a Christian gentleman of the highest type, whose heart went out to the masses and who, despite his high position, never lost the common touch nor let the cry of distress or need go unheeded. While he understood the frailties and weaknesses of his fellows, he did not criticize nor condemn; tolerant in his views, he understood and encouraged.

SERVICE WILL BE MISSED

That in his going a great heart and a noble soul has crossed the river. The people of his district will miss his loyal, able, and unselfish service, his colleagues will miss his mature and reliable counsel and advice, and those within the charmed circle of his personal friendship will miss the warm and wholesome influence of his gentle nature, and through the years will never forget that human and characteristic chuckle as he told or listened to a good story.

The words of the immortal poet so aptly apply to him:

"His life was gentle; and the elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, 'This was a man!'"

Mr. GARRETT passed away here in this city December 13, 1931, and when it was learned of his passing the entire membership of the House was deeply affected. He was loved not only by his home people, as disclosed by resolutions of the Houston bar, but by all of his colleagues here. He was an able statesman and a faithful servant of the people. He was conscientious and kind-hearted, and his good deeds will live on and on.

He was elected to the House of Representatives of Tennessee in 1892 and reelected in 1894. In 1902 he was elected to the State Senate of Tennessee and reelected in 1904.

Mr. GARRETT moved to Houston in 1905 and in 1912 he was elected to the Sixty-third Congress from the State at large. He was elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress from the State at large in 1916.

He served in the National House from the eighth congressional district of Texas in the Sixty-seventh, Sixty-eighth, Sixty-ninth, Seventieth, Seventy-first, and Seventy-second Congresses. At the last general election he was elected as Congressman from the same district to the Seventy-third Congress, which would open its sessions next spring.

During the Sixty-third and Sixty-fifth Congresses he was actively associated with President Woodrow Wilson. During this second term of his office—the famous war Congress—he was a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and served as chairman of the subcommittee to recommend appropriations for supplies for the Army.

It was on the recommendation of this committee that billions of dollars were appropriated for the World War.

"I shall always be glad that I was permitted to play my humble part of helpfulness in those days and times," was the way he modestly referred to his services during the Sixty-third and Sixty-fifth Congresses.

AIDED WILSON

During the latter session Congressman GARRETT had gotten to be one of President Wilson's right-hand men. He was a profound admirer of the war President.

Under the matchless leadership of President Wilson—

He said in an address in July, 1932—

the Sixty-third and Sixty-fifth Congresses enacted a forward-looking, progressive, and constructive legislative program in the interest of all the people that stands without a parallel in the history of the Republic.

DANIEL GARRETT has represented Port Houston before the War Department and before Congress for 12 years, and a large share of the credit for securing Federal aid in the development of the Houston Ship Channel belongs to him.

FRIEND OF LABOR

He was always an active friend of labor, the veteran, and the farmer, having lent active support to all farm-relief measures and handled compensation claims for more than 2,000 ex-service men before Federal bureaus.

It was largely through his influence that Camp Logan and Ellington Field were both located in Harris County. He was famed among Texans in Washington for his ability to get through appropriations for his congressional district.

Congressman GARRETT also piloted through a Republican Congress the bill appropriating $50,000 for the riot sufferers—widows and orphans of men shot down by negro soldiers during the 1917 mutiny—and he was very active in having the War Department move the negro soldiers from Camp Logan.

During his last campaign Congressman GARRETT's prohibition views were made an issue by his opponents.

PROHIBITION STAND

Prohibition is a great moral and economic question that belongs to the people themselves—he said during the campaign.

It should never become a political question to be used as a yardstick to measure men for public service.

He called attention to the local vote on prohibition resubmission and declared that he would abide by the decision of the voters of his district.

"My stand on the prohibition question is well known," he declared. "For more than 25 years I have earnestly and consistently fought for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors and the abolition of the saloon."

He pledged that he would be governed by the voters' choice, which he termed "yielding to the people's mandate without surrendering the convictions of a lifetime." The democratic principle of government is more important "than my beliefs," he declared.

HELD IMPORTANT POST

Speaking of his tenure of the office as a Representative of the eighth district, he said:

It has been my one purpose to serve all the people in every walk of life, without regard to class or creed, devoting myself wholeheartedly to the service of all.

Mr. GARRETT pioneered for woman suffrage, he helped create the Federal reserve system, strengthen the antitrust laws, give new guarantees to labor, levy taxes where there was the most ability to pay, foster the welfare of women and children by Federal effort.

At the time of his death he was a member of the powerful Rules Committee of the House, one of the most important assignments which can come to any Congressman.

As we see our colleagues constantly passing we are reminded of that great poem by that great Mason, Albert Pike:

Life is a count of losses,
Every year;
For the weak are heavier crosses,
Every year;
Lost springs with sobs replying
Unto weary autumn's sighing,
While those we love are dying,
Every year.

It is growing darker, colder,
Every year;
As the heart and soul grow older,
Every year;
I care not now for dancing,
Or for eyes with passion glancing,
Love is less and less entrancing
Every year.

The days have less of gladness,
Every year;
The nights more weight of sadness,
Every year;
Fair springs no longer charm us,
The winds and weather harm us,
The threats of death alarm us,
Every year.

There comes new cares and sorrows,
Every year;
Dark days and darker morrows,
Every year;
The ghosts of dead loves haunt us,
The ghosts of changed friends taunt us,
And disappointments daunt us,
Every year.

Of the loves and sorrows blended,
Every year;
Of the charms of friendships ended,
Every year;
Of the ties that still might bind me
Until time to death resigns me,
My infirmities remind me,
Every year.

Ah, how sad to look before us
Every year;
While the cloud grows darker over us,
Every year;
When we see the blossoms faded
That to bloom we might have aided
And immortal garlands braided,
Every year.

To the past go more dead faces,
Every year;
As the loved leave vacant places,
Every year;
Everywhere the sad eyes meet us,
In the evening's dusk they greet us,
And to come to them entreat us,
Every year.

"You are growing old," they tell us,
Every year;
"You are more alone," they tell us,
Every year;
"You can win no new affection,
You have only recollection,
Deeper sorrow and dejection,"
Every year.

Too true life's shores are shifting,
Every year;
And we are seaward drifting,
Every year;
Old places, changing, fret us,
The living more forget us,
There are fewer to regret us,
Every year.

But the truer life draws nigher,
Every year;
And its morning star climbs higher,
Every year;
Earth's hold on us grows slighter,
And the heavy burden lighter,
And the dawn immortal brighter,
Every year.

ROBERT REYBURN BUTLER

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I count it a privilege to join with the many friends of ROBERT REYBURN BUTLER in a brief tribute to his memory. I met him when I entered Congress in 1929. I saw him frequently in his committee work, and in this Congress served with him on one of the House committees. We became friends. "Judge" BUTLER, as we called him, was a fine type of citizen. He was fearless and able, and in his death the House of Representatives lost one of its outstanding Members.

His was a record of service. He loved his fellow man. He took his responsibility as a Member of this House seriously, and the welfare of his fellows, the average man, was the test he applied to legislative proposals. Quick to champion their cause, he was equally fearless in opposition to legislation of an unwise or improper kind.

The first session of the Seventy-second Congress faced many trying situations. Its membership, for the most part, regardless of party, met the difficulties with courage and devotion to the public welfare. Congressman BUTLER was one who reasoned clearly and acted patriotically. When the motives of Congress were being questioned, and the enemies of the Republic were directing a flood of unfounded hatred and abuse upon our membership, Congressman BUTLER came to the defense of his colleagues. He inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 10, 1932, copy of a letter he had written on this subject. It might well have been a speech, for Judge BUTLER gave a frank and powerful message on the problems with which Congress was concerned. It was brief. It was unequivocal. It was sound.

Said he, in part:

I have your letter of April 27, and, while contrary to popular belief, we are extremely busy and crowded for time, yet I feel that you are entitled to a more extended communication than a mere acknowledgment, because I think you are laboring under misinformation which has been industriously disseminated by interests apparently seeking to discredit the Congress and divert the attention of the rank and file of the American people away from some of the real causes of national distress.

* * * * * * *

While the Congress of the United States is doing its best to protect the business of the country and maintain the confidence of the people in our business institutions, these people are constantly inveighing against the Congress and against the Government, and if capitalism in this country is abolished and the Nation takes up the bloody road to Moscow it will not be through organized "reds" and communists but it will be due in a large measure to those with swollen fortunes who have joined hands with the "reds" in an effort to destroy the confidence of our people in their Government.

Such was our friend and neighbor, Congressman BUTLER. He was a man of few words. He never dodged the opposition, but welcomed the combat. He was a worthy champion and a worthy foe.

Others who knew him more intimately will discuss his long record of public service in the State of Oregon. As one of his colleagues who knew him and appreciated his good qualities I offer this sentiment:

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days.
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

When hearts whose truth was proven,
Like thine, are laid in earth,
There should a wreath be woven
To tell the world their worth.

We miss our friend. The Grim Reaper has taken his toll. We will hear his kindly voice no more. His friendly face is but a memory. But his soul still lives, and in that unseen world death is not the victor.

What is this Death, ye deep read sophists, say?—
Death is no more than one unceasing change;
New forms arise, while other forms decay,
Yet all is Life throughout creation's range.

The towering Alps, the haughty Appennine,
The Andes, wrapt in everlasting snow,
The Appalachian and the Ararat
Sooner or later must to ruin go.

Hills sink to plains, and man returns to dust,
That dust supports a reptile or a flower;
Each changeful atom by some other nurs'd
Takes some new form to perish in an hour.

Too nearly join'd to sickness, toils, and pains,
(Perhaps for former crimes, imprison'd here)
True to itself the immortal soul remains,
And seeks new mansions in the starry sphere.

When Nature bids thee from the world retire,
With joy thy lodging leave, a fated guest;
In Paradise, the land of thy desire,
Existing always, always to be blest.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, one of the saddest things in official life is to see a colleague stricken by death while in the prime of life. Such was the untimely death of Congressman ROBERT R. BUTLER.

Judge BUTLER came to Congress well prepared to serve his district, State, and Nation. His previous experience in the State senate, his service on the bench in Oregon, and his fine legal training gave him at once a standing among the Members of the House enjoyed by only a few. He had a brilliant and keen legal mind, and as soon as he was appointed on the Public Lands Committee, of which I was chairman, I recognized that he was a real asset to the work of that great committee.

Judge BUTLER was splendidly informed upon the problems of the West and experienced in unusual degree to assume the large responsibilities that fall upon a Member of the legislative body which has so much to do with the determining of the policies of our great Nation. He carried on with the intense earnestness that marks the activities of men who are impelled with the desire to render good service.
